THE CANNON FEVER.—The celebrated German poet Goethe was present as a spectator at the battle of Valmy, in 1792, between the armies of the French Republic, under Dumourier and Kellerman, and the allied armies, under the Duke of Brunswick, and gives his first impressions of an artillery battle as follows:

I had heard so much of the "cannon fever," that I wanted to know what kind of a thing it was. Ebnui, and a spirit which every kind of danger excites to daring—nay, even to rashness, induced me to ride up quite coolly to the out-work of La Lune. This was again occupied by our people but it presented the wildest aspect. The roofs were shot to pieces, the corn shocks scattered about, the bodies of men, mortally wounded, stretched upon them here and there, and occasionally a spent cannon ball fell and rattled among the tilted roofs. Quite plainly surveying the scene, and could of the French. They were standing in the form of a semicircle, in the greatest quiet and security—Kellerman, then on the left wing, being the easiest to reach.

I fell in with good company on the officers of my acquaintance belonging to the general staff and the regiment, who were greatly surprised to find me here. They wanted to take me up again with them, but I spoke to them of particular objects I had in view, and they left me without further discussion to my well known singular caprice. I had now arrived quite in the region where the balls were playing across me; the sound of them is curious enough, as if it were composed of the humming of tops, the gurgling of water, and the whistling of birds. They were less dangerous by reason of the wetness of the ground—whenever one fell it stuck fast—and thus my foolish experimental ride was secured against the danger at least of the balls rebounding. In the midst of these circumstances, I was soon able to remark that something unusual was taking place within me. I paid close attention to it, and still, the sensation can only be described by similitude. It appeared as if you were in some extremely hot place, and at the time quite penetrated by the heat of it, so that you feel yourself, as it were, quite one with the element in which you are. The eyes lose nothing of their strength or clearness; but it is as if the world had a kind of brown-red tint, which makes the situation as well as the surrounding objects more impressive.

It is not possible to perceive any agitation of the blood; but everything seemed rather to be swallowed up in the glow of which I speak. From this, then, it is clear in what sense this condition can be called a fever. It is remarkable, however, that the horrible, uneasy feeling, arising from it, is produced in us solely through the ears; for the cannon thunder, the howling and crashing of balls through the air, is the real cause of these sensations. After I had ridden back, and was in perfect security, I remarked with surprise that the glow was completely extinguished, and not the slightest feverish agitation was left behind. On the whole, the condition is one of the least enviable; as, indeed, among my dear and noble comrades, I found scarcely one who expressed a real passionate desire to try it.

Here is the pithiest sermon ever preached: "Our ingress in life is naked and bare; our progress in life is trouble and care; our egress out of it we know not where; but doing well here, we shall do well there; I could not tell more by preaching a year."

Gen. Beauregard lately presided at a Democratic meeting in New Orleans.
