BRICK POMEROY'S COURTSHIP.
Those other girls of ours, as we are informed by letter, has done gone and got well locked into a tinkereast of the gospel who attends prayer meetings, swops horses, stands chaplain in the army, and gets drunk on the sly! Oh dear. This is much misery! Wherefore shall we flee now? How we used to do the courting for these girls, candy, pea-nuts, worm lozenges, peppermint drops, little drops of honey soap, night blooming for seriousness, and such evidence did we pour into them laps of hers whereon at vesper chimes this head of ours did rest, so sweetly rest—Oh dear! O! K—list! a!

We used to blacken our boots, starch our hair, grease our shirt and curled our eyebrows for them girls. And we rode horses for her paternal derivative to cultivate corn; and we milked the brindle heifer as what no other boy could milk, and we split oven wood, and who would not for her ma?

And at night when bats came forth, and tumble bugs crawled over the leaf, and young pullets sat in maiden meditation fancy free, holding their heads under one wing so as to learn love by hearing their hearts beat, we would hasten under Kalista's window, and she would with her lily white hand, spail us by the hair till we arrived at the bower of love, as she called her garret. 'Twas thus our hair become less, and our confectionery for Kalista increased.

When the week had busted on the rock of Saturday night, we wandered by the brooklet and let the brook wander too. And Kalista went forth with us. Hand in hand, like the Siamese twinsters we roamed, sat on the dew bank to catch cold in our heads, and luxuriate on the "bank wet with dew!" And we used to recline against a fatherly and motherly elm tree, and squeeze our each others. As we rolled our eyes and peeked upward into the blue vault, our spirits longed to vault into it, but didn't. Oh! sparking is heaven in two volumes, with the price omitted. Did you ever spark? If not, advances your works upon a female crinoline dear, and commence active hostilities to onset!

Once we sparked Kalista when her mother was looking. The old lady ooped us, because it reminded her of other times, she said. But she didn't oop us stopped. When we wanted to repose our head, Kalista held her lap and into it we went like an apple. When we wanted a kiss we told Kalista such was our desire, when she would lean her amber head over upon our forces and say, "Now, Brick tea is ready." You can just gamble we took tea from that little table lots of times, and never asked any one to help put back the plates! Kalista was a zephyr on a kiss. It was petty near her best holt. Making mush was Kalista's charm. When the water did boil, how she sprinkled meal into the iron—iron—recepta—kettle, and shake her locks in glee to see the infant mush bubble and spatter like a fellow kissing a baby with his mouth full of bechnuts.

We courted, sparked and courted Kalista seventeen long years. She grew from size to greater size, and all went merry as a funeral bell. Kalista's maternal author said we might, and we intended to, and we should have wedded but for the looks of the thing. Then there came from the war a journeyman convertor, and he offered Kalista all he had, and the pair wedded at once; and now Kalista is telling some other delegate that "supper is ready!"—and thus another of our hopes is spilled over life's precipice, and we are left to mourn for the candy we gave unto Kalista, who has left us all to die!—La Crosse Democrat.
