SELFISH.

In a quarrel between husband and wife, according to the general understanding, if a third person steps in to take the side of either, both turn on him and, forgetting their personal differences, together give him a good thrashing. In the present Strahorn railroad situation the Portland Oregonian is venturing into the position of the intervening third person, which has caused us to recall a few things about Portland itself and its treatment of various projects which were thought to be prejudicial to Portland interests.

How, for example, has Portland in the past treated the efforts of Astoria to gain the standing and recognition to which its maritime position entitle it? Has Portland helped Astoria to become a seaport in competition with Portland? Or has Portland tried to block progress that threatened local interests?

Portland has large and important flour milling interests. Ocean going vessels can come to Portland and load the flour from her mills, or the wheat from her elevators, brought from the interior by rail. This is valuable business for the city, and built entirely on the railroad rate structure. When Astoria wanted a common point rate on wheat, in order that the commodity might be brought to it by rail and then shipped on ocean steamers, which would thereby be saved the time of the trip up the Willamette, Portland fought, and for years was successful in preventing Astoria from getting what she wanted.

Was this unselfish on the part of Portland or was she looking out for the interests of her local industries?

Was it unselfish on the part of Portland to fight the Willamette valley saw mills who wanted a freight rate on their lumber like that which Portland enjoyed? Here again what considerations moved Portland opinion, selfishness or the spirit of progress that the Oregonian charges Bend with lacking?

What has Portland tried to do with Seattle's Alaskan trade? How did the Portland merchants view it when a shippard company started a store for its employees? We seem to remember a gentle protest from the Oregonian for the benefit of its advertisers.

How has Portland treated the Strahorn road?
Has it offered one penny of finan-
