WHERE TO GO TOMORROW

ELK AND LAVA LAKES

By William Sproat (U. S. Forest Service.)
Where the Deschutes begins its winding course to the Columbia river, far back in the wooded hills, close to the Cascade summit, Little Lava lake lies, and nearby its neighbors, Big Lava and Elk lakes.

On our 60-mile trip tomorrow we pass through the well known Crane Prairie region, a strip of country peculiar in itself because of its contrast to the country that surrounds it. Crane Prairie is a vast green meadow, which lies 40 miles from Bend along the tributary streams to the Deschutes river. Quite in contrast to the turbulent disposition through the canyons and gorges we see so often, the Deschutes flows lazily by its numerous bends. We will stop here for an hour. It is a pity we have not an artist with us. To one endowed with a sense of colors and tints, one will revel in the natural beauty of this prairie. We are able to count any number of shades of green and brown all blending into a scheme too rich for word picture. The stream here is deep blue. Its depth is indicated by the slow running of the water. The banks drop off abruptly. The waters are abundant with trout. The Deschutes river at Crane Prairie is a fisherman's paradise.

Lakes Have Charm.
But we must not tarry for we are bound for the lakes. Twelve miles further along the road, after crossing the numerous forest service bridges at Snow creek and the Deschutes, we finally reach a side road, two miles long, which leads into the baby Lava lake. Here we may stop, if we choose, to cast a fly where the Deschutes begins its course to the north. We may boat, too, if we like over the beautiful smooth sheet of still water. Again we must hurry. Two miles along our trip the road passes along the shore of Big Lava lake, which is about a mile long and a half mile wide. We cannot remain here long because the end of our journey is six miles distant, where fishing is usually excellent from the shores of Elk lake. Why Elk lake, you ask? Many of the rare animal specimens known by this name have been seen along its banks. "The most beautiful in the Cascades"—that's what people who have traveled the range say. From the lake may be seen rising abruptly the south Sister, Broken Top and Bachelor Butte, which reflect their snow capped crests into the waters, so smooth and still as to reflect like a mirror below.

At this point we are two miles from the Cascade divide and have come to an elevation of 5000 feet—where camping and fishing is at the best. On the north shores of this lake there are numerous gushing, ice cold springs—delightful waters pouring forth.

Lots Are Available.
Appreciating the value to the city and town folk of Oregon, the forest service has surveyed numerous lots along the shores. Uncle Sam wants the people to avail themselves of the beauties of his property. He is making it possible for the man, the lover of natural beauty, to get in touch with these beautiful spots. They are available at an extremely nominal cost. The roads are being improved into this beautiful uncultivated and uncommercialized playground of Oregon.

Now then, if you can't go with us, do this if you want to go Elk lake tomorrow. From Bend to Elk lake follow the La Pine road south to Harper, where you turn west (right) and cross the Deschutes river bridge. Then follow the sign boards to Crane Prairie by way of the head of Fall river. From Crane Prairie the Elk lake road is the only one that leads to the north.

Amphibious Soldiers.
A Frenchman has suggested that with a little training the soldier may be amphibious to a certain degree. It is contended that with practice a body of soldiers with their arms and accoutrements could cross a stream 60 feet wide by merely walking across on the bottom with the water over their heads.

Missing His Opportunity.

The conductor of a band, giving an open-air concert, beat time very energetically, leaning now toward one part of the band and now to another, and stamping his foot apparently in paroxysms of musical fervor. Mike, in the audience, watched him, fascinated; but at the end of the selection, with a disappointed air, he turned to leave. "How did ye like it, Mike?" asked his friend. "Come away!" said Mike, in disgust. "O've been watchin' him for half an hour, and he hasn't hit one of them yet!"

Grateful Enjoyment.

Suffering is not necessarily a blessing in disguise. Sometimes it is simply an undisguised evil, an evil that we have no right to be carrying about with us. Self-denial for its own sake is only a foolish refusal of pleasures that we might thankfully enjoy. Courage and faith when trouble comes are so more our duty than is grateful enjoyment of our blessings when the days are bright.
