Why the greatest writers really write the greatest stories

REALLY great writers, the only writers whose novels and stories are worth while, give us the result of their powers of observation, and their talent for self-expression, through the medium of fiction, with a real background—a real purpose. That is the kind of novels and stories in this month's Cosmopolitan. We give you a glimpse of a few of them here

John Galsworthy

—who is England's most distinguished novelist wrote "In Chancery" to tell you about the strange domestic entanglements of the Forsyte family, and the working out of Soames Forsyte's theory that a wife is part of a man's property.

Fannie Hurst

—in her first novel tells about a girl who contracted a loveless marriage to please her parents and how she attempted to solve her own problem of self-determination. Begin "Star Dust" today.

Peter B. Kyne

—who was born and raised in the great Northwest, tells, in "Kindred of the Dust," his latest novel, a fine, romantic story of the people who live and love there. His novel is a tale of the passion of youthful hearts.

Rupert Hughes

—whimsically portrays the narrowed feelings of a girl who thought her fiance unfaithful. Of course he was innocent. But it wasn't until they saw "The Animal that Laughs," that all was forgiven.

Frank R. Adams

—gives his version of what might occur if you visited the home of a former sweetheart and found her husband beating her. A situation fortunately rare and strikingly unusual. Read about it in "Until Tomorrow."

Gouverneur Morris

—tells how he thinks men will act if, under Bolsheviki rule, our women should become public property. "Bill the Boob" isn't the first man who had no sense until a woman knocked it into him. This story is a thriller!

Harris Dickson

—simply tells us another Old Reliable story—a delightful yarn about a couple of crooks, a postponed parade and a badly sold colored gentleman who had the best intentions—and very little else. "Sticky Fingers" is an amusing story.

Thomas Burke

—writing of the love of San-li-po for Wing Dee, tells how Lee Yip brought the youth home with him and how San-li-po knew at once that she loved him. It is another startling Limehouse story and it is called "Scarlet Shoes."
