

BRITAIN WILL USE AIR ARMY IN GOVERNING MESOPOTAMIA

By P. M. Sarr

(United Press Staff Correspondent.)
LONDON, Feb. 1.—The possibility of effective controlling a troublesome country by means of an "Air Army" is to be thoroughly tried out by the British in Mesopotamia, or Iraq, to give it its new-old official name. The originator of the scheme is Colonial Secretary Winston Churchill, who has undertaken many daring and ingenious experiments during his cabinet career.

When War Secretary, Churchill had to face a considerable amount of criticism over the number of Anglo-Indian troops retained in Mesopotamia at the expense of the British taxpayer, and he promised to replace these troops immediately with "aeroplane patrols." On going to the Colonial office, which is responsible for the supervision of Mesopotamia, he was able to perfect his plans and start an entirely new scheme.

A fleet of 150 troop-carrying aeroplanes is under construction, each capable of carrying 10 soldiers fully equipped for fighting, and two machine guns with necessary ammunition. By this means a complete battalion of 1,000 men can be transported hundreds of miles across the deserts and plains, and concentrated in any troubled spot, without the fatigue of forced marches, and before a savage enemy expects attack, he can be faced by a powerful and perfectly fresh force.

A number of these aeroplanes have already been delivered and satisfactorily tested, so that within a very few months the authorities will have a unique but substantial movable force ready to put down trouble in any part of the dominions nominally ruled by King Feisal.

The Mesopotamian Arabs are fine hand-to-hand fighters and although they are a bit scared of aeroplanes, they are much more impressed by the appearance of a substantial force of infantry. British War Chiefs will watch the experiment with intense interest and if it is successful the policy of air defence will be tried in other parts of the empire.

DEADLY NATURE OF MOONSHINE SHOWN

Fusel Oil, Lye, Wood Alcohol, Mice, And Wood Insects Found in Illicit Liquor.

HOUSTON, Texas, Feb. 1.—Lye, fusel oil, and wood alcohol are not the only poisonous substances in bootleg whiskey, according to Deputy Sheriff Frank Hampe, Hampe, Harris county deputy, who claims the state still-capturing championship, is considered the local bootleg authority. "Not only do fusel oil and lye exist in poison moonshine whiskey, but frequently cockroaches, mice and wood insects go into the deadly concoction," Hampe said.

"Barrels used for fermenting mash are left uncovered," according to Hampe. "This allows the rodents and insects to fall in and die. Moonshiners make no efforts to take the dead animals and bugs out." A dead pig was found in a barrel of mash destroyed on one of his raids, Hampe asserted.
