A MEETING

Chapter 41

It was the one decision Dora had ever made against the open opposition of her aunt, and the silent depression of her father, which acted as strongly as all the other influences to keep her tied down.

She made ready to go—the "making" being to pack her very few possessions into a shabby old trunk and put a night dress and waist into a funny little black bag that had been her mother's, and old fashioned then.

She was to take an early morning train to Albany, change to an express and arrive in New York early in the evening. Gloria had written it out so she had no trouble.

Her father saw her off—the rest of the family being too busy to pay her that parting courtesy. Gladys had decided, since she was a married woman, that she should go in for Bridge and Five Hundred and afternoon parties, rather than the guessing games and the more childish amusements of former days. A card party was to happen that afternoon and Gladys was busy spending the morning making refreshments for it. Gladys had no maid—Norris City, in fact, was quite out of the way and most unsophisticated in its outlook upon life.

Aunt Maude was to "finish up" early and go over and help. Uncle Peter was out at the farm part of the time—so it was left to Jim to see her to the station.

And Jim was the last thing she saw of the town as the train pulled out. Or rather, the last one.

A quiet voice behind her said, "Hello, Dora," and she turned with a start at the sound. It was a voice that was going through her mind and her heart almost every waking hour.

Morton stood by the seat—in fact, quite casually, sat down. He handed her a large white package.

"Chocolates—" he explained awkwardly. "Send-off, you know. Sorry you're going—I mean I'm glad."

"Oh thank you! I mean, are you?" was as intelligent an answer as Dora could make.

"I'm going down—just to the next station, got business there." Morton felt his presence needed explanation. "Nice we can both be on the same train—I mean, it gives me a chance to say goodbye."

Dora was not stupid. In spite of her inhibitions, her feeling of inferiority to everyone, her great constraint with Morton—she knew from his voice and his manner that he had no business in the next town, and was doing this to say goodbye to her. It was his one way of showing her he was sorry for everything that had passed.

The next town was a village of 10 minutes from the line. He wanted to know whether she knew how to change at Albany, she showed him the letter of direction. He explained in greater detail, and then there was a sudden silence between them. When he went over this line before, and changed at this point, he was on his honeymoon with Gladys.

He shook hands goodbye, scarcely touching her fingers. She watched him from the window—turning out of the village and heading down the road towards Norris City.

But she understood the awkward attention. Morton knew he had hurt her and was sorry—and generously glad she was going to happier surroundings. It made her feel sad, yet that sort of sadness was rather precious.

The chocolates were all she had to eat that day, for she had not the courage to go into the restaurants near the station in Albany. She sat in the waiting room and read until her train came. Then, half in terror for fear she had gotten on the wrong one—there were so many—she huddled up by the window to get her first glimpse of the river.

The Hudson fascinated her so she forgot to be frightened. But when the train reached the station in New York, and everybody rose as one person and began scrambling towards the door, she was weak from nervous excitement and terror.

Suppose Gloria forgot to meet her! Suppose Frankie were ill so she could not come!

She could see nothing at the platform except people hurrying along in one direction. There was no one to meet her—but there was no one to meet anyone else. Porters in red caps were flying about. "Porter, lady, porter!"

She turned a white face to a benignant old negro in a red cap.

"All alone, missy? Oh—das all right, jee' down pas' the gates, you'll be met outside."

Reassured, she followed the crowd. The station met her with a blaze of lights and an overwhelming grandeur of marble pillars. People were meeting other people, kissing and shaking hands—everyone had a friend but her. There was no Gloria.

She stood quaking with terror. Gloria might be late!

A man's voice said:

"You can't be anyone else but Miss

"Proper Food and Exercise," by ARTHUR A. McGOVERN
Former physical director, Cornell Medical College

Care for teeth pays health dividends

FOR the past few years the attention of the public has been frequently called by the press and the medical profession to the dangers that exist in infected teeth.

These infections, arising from bad teeth, pass through the system, striking and causing trouble in the weakest portion of the victim's anatomy, whether it be the heart, lungs, joints, or stomach.

An old adage is particularly true in regard to your teeth: "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." The foremost thought in dentistry today is preventative dentistry.

Preventative dentistry can be aided largely through a sensible selection of foods that are conducive to mastication. Dental authorities everywhere emphasize the necessity for proper mastication to develop the teeth and the surrounding tissues.

Brushing the teeth cannot alone replace the natural cleansing derived from the mastication of hard foods. Hard foods furnish the required exercise to keep the tissues surrounding the teeth in a healthy condition.

I recommend prophylactic treatment by an oral hygienist as well as an examination of the teeth by a dentist every three months. By so doing all decayed teeth and cavities will be taken care of in their incipency. This will prevent death of the pulp in the tooth and will check the possibility of any abscess formation.

The child should be taken to the dentist for treatment at the earliest possible age. Straightening of the teeth should always be taken care of at an early age.

Proper diet for a child whose teeth are about to erupt is essential in order that the teeth will receive the proper salts, such as calcium and phosphorus. These will prevent the teeth from becoming soft, thereby guarding them against early decay.

Cod liver oil for children with rickets is recommended. Fresh fruits and vegetables that contain good vitamins and salts for the bones are also suggested. Starchy foods and foods that have high carbohydrate content should be omitted. Whole wheat bread instead of white bread should be used at all times.

BREAKFAST: Grapefruit or orange juice, one egg boiled or poached, two Graham, bran or corn muffins, coffee substitute, cocoa or weak tea. Between breakfast and lunch take two glasses of water.

LUNCHEON: A vegetable luncheon consisting of any of the following vegetables: spinach, peas, egg-plant, string beans, turnips, asparagus, corn. Glass of milk, dark bread, and for dessert rice or tapioca pudding. Between lunch and dinner three glasses of water.

DINNER: One helping of lean meat, fish or chicken, broiled, one green vegetable, a baked potato, be sure to eat the skin, and for dessert fresh fruit in season, nuts or crackers and coffee.

Brightening Up the Corners

If there has been no opportunity or if opportunity has been neglected to lay out the back yard into an ornamental design more or less elaborate to suit the taste of the owner, the neglect can be remedied in great part by corner plantings. Filling in the corners with tall growing annuals or a few perennials will be a start at a design and will help to form a frame for the grass plot.

Castor beans are the most stately annuals for quick effect. They will assist in hiding outbuildings in a hurry.

The annual sunflowers of the cucumber leaved type, catalogued as Helianthus cucumerifolius, will make a fine group and furnish quantities of miniature and delicate sunflowers ranging from pale yellow to orange for cutting during the summer. Cosmos will fill a corner with a feathery mass of foliage and in mid and late summer will bedeck itself with myriads of handsome white, pink, rose and crimson flowers, fine for bouquets.

Plant early flowering types of cosmos now.

For a sunny corner in soil only fairly rich, wonderful effect can be produced by a few of the fine new types of dahlias. They grow to a height of six feet or more, according to variety, with clean shining foliage and in September produce wonderful bloom, ranging from great fluffs the size of your head in some of the advanced types down to little pom-poms two inches through.

The dahlia is now the queen of the autumn and no garden should be without a few specimens. Plants are on sale later in the season and the dry tubers can be secured now. There is no hurry about putting them in as any time up till June will do.

Spider plant, Cleome, is another tall, fast growing annual which makes fine clumps and for a shady corner nothing is better than the flowering tobacco, Nicotiana glauca and its types being most effective. The white variety with its spiky stars brightens up a dim corner at dusk wonderfully.

What woman would throw pearls away?

Of course, no woman would throw away a perfectly good rope of pearls.

But many women throw away something more precious than pearls when they squander their beauty, their time, and their health, doing the family washing.

It not only coarsens a woman's hands, but it wastes a day every week, and it is a steady drain on her energy. If women were meant for such heavy labor, there would be women blacksmiths and stokers, for even these tasks burn up no more energy than a hard day's work at the tub.

Save the pearls of beauty, time and health by telephoning us to call for your weekly bundle. We will do all the washing and part or all of the ironing.
