A BIG PARTY

Chapter 42

Dora turned to find the owner of this voice. A tall young man, rather handsome, with a fresh skin and blue eyes was standing there looking down at her—apparently as much alarmed as she was.

"You see, it's this way—" he began again. Then he broke off to laugh. "I feel like an awful fool. Do forgive me, Miss Nicholson. It's all Gloria's fault. I'm sure someone's going to pounce on me for abducting a child." He looked around, hunting the Traveler's Aid representative to help him out of his difficulty, half afraid if she did not come that he couldn't explain.

"Then he looked at Dora again and began to laugh.

"Is Gloria ill?" Dora asked.
"No—she couldn't leave Frankie, who is getting a temperature again. I've been there all afternoon amusing him because she had to go to her office. Here—she sent this note."

He thrust at her an envelope unsealed. Inside on a single sheet of paper was scrawled in pencil:

"It's all right, darling. Bobby will bring you here."

Dora looked up again at the stranger. He had a somewhat flat face and was too perfectly dressed. His beautifully manicured nails made her ashamed of her own that were split and rough and stained.

But she wasn't at all afraid to go with him. She handed him the check for her trunk and gave herself up to looking around the station while he went away to collect her things and take them to a cab.

When he came back she was standing with her face raised looking at the blue ceiling with its painted stars and marveling that some of them showed electric lights.

"Beautiful, isn't it—no one who lives here ever looks at it so you'd better stare your fill now," he remarked, and then began to laugh again.

In the taxi he said: "I should have introduced myself in a less sketchy manner than Gloria did. My whole name is Robert Darcy."

"Mine is Pandora Nicholson," Dora managed. But she couldn't think of anything more to say, so she turned her face and looked out the taxi window at the houses and people and streets, amazed at the size of everything and the noise of the city, hoping Mr. Darcy wouldn't think her rude.

They stopped at last at an old fashioned apartment house. They had to climb three flights, the taxi man grumbling as he carried the trunk. Then a door was opened and a joyous voice called:

"Hello, dear!"

And Pandora found herself being embraced and kissed by Gloria. They went into a room that seemed full of people—though there were only two men, Frankie on the couch, Gloria, Darcy and herself. A fire was burning in a tiny fireplace—Gloria took the shabby apartment because of that one feature.

"This is Pan," Gloria announced. "Now then, run home, both of you. Bobby can stay because he's been at the station, and is going to make broth for Frankie."

Dora was so frightened she backed off into a corner. The two men left. Quiet comparative quiet, settled on the room.

Dora went over to Frankie who lay with bright eyes and flushed face on the couch.

"It's great fun being sick," he informed her. "Bobby's been doing stunts to amuse me while Mama's out, until the people below banged on the stampipes. We were making
