A REACTION
Chapter 52

"But," Pan fairly gasped, "you hadn't any money either! How could he do such a thing?"

Gloria began to laugh, a little hysterically.

"People can do anything!" she cried. "It was too ridiculous to think about—without being amused. There that poor, dear, misguided man had gone off, cheerfully carrying his entire fortune, his whole future—in his pocketbook—with some idea that because he'd been lucky before in gambling, the gods were favoring him and would let him break the bank—I believe he had some such dramatic idea—breaking the bank at Monte Carlo! Possibly thought it would look well in headlines."

"It did—only the story was about another fortune lost in gambling! I wired him a long quotation—something about the gods being good to those they sought to destroy—which made him furious. Then I wired him enough to pay his hotel and get to London."

"And having gotten there, he went up in the air because I'd been dining with Santley Collins! Santley, you see, is a lawyer there—he's an expert on American law, living in London where he makes large sums giving advice to expatriated Americans about the laws of their own country—also advising Englishmen who have American interests. He was helping me buy a house, a complicated business over there which needs a lawyer if one isn't to be hopelessly confused."

"I suppose I was hard on Frank. He must have been upset losing so much money."

"Did you care—about the money?" Pan asked. She had never heard a story as thrilling as this one.

"No, I like money; somehow we always had plenty to spend, even though Frank went into debt. His mother always pulled him out of it. But—well, with more money, he would have been even wiser, I think."

"In any case, I had the equivalent of 10 or 12 thousand dollars in an English bank. That was to buy the lease of a house and part of the furniture. Fortunately I hadn't bought anything. There was some trouble about breaking the agreement to take the house I'd decided on, but Santley got me out of that. Meantime, poor Frank was raging because I was staying with friends while he was at a hotel. He said I would ruin his reputation by treating him that way, poor Frank!" And Gloria smiled a little over poor Frank's general lack of logic.

"Finally I drew $5,000 from the bank, and turned the rest over to him. Then I gathered up my infant, and just like the fugitive Eliza, I fled out of London with my child in my arms. Only there weren't any lumps of ice to leap across, which rather spoiled the dramatic effect."

And she laughed. But her laugh cut through Pan, who was ready to try about it.

"I told no one but Santley and George where I was going. They'd been so fine they had a right to know—Frank hadn't. I couldn't go on with it any more, particularly when I found out that his Monte Carlo companion had returned to London."

"I went to Cornwall, where I had a cottage for a month for $10, and there we lived for less than $50. I simply lay around and baked in the sun and saw no one but the woman who did the work in the house. I was ready to give up everything by that time—you said you can't forget a past and begin again, and I said you were wrong. But you are right to this extent—you can't forget entirely. It comes back sometimes when you're feeling rotten."

"I spent a month feeling sorry for myself."

"Were you still in love with him?"

"No!" Gloria raised herself on her elbow and stared hard into the fire. "No! He'd done everything he could to kill that. He never was in love, after he married me. He's the sort that only wanted what he hadn't got, that's why all women but his wife attracted him."

"But do you know—of course you don't though, you're too young—that the most agonizing thing is to have been in love and to have been loved—and to find that person unworthy of any sort of affection. That's the most unbearable disappointment life can hold!"

"I know," said Pan gently.

"Anyway, Santley motored down one week end, and said he and George had decided I ought to go home for a while. But Frank was watching the English boats. So the baby and I crossed the channel and took passage from Havre—with the rest of my $500."

The phone rang sharply. Gloria rose and answered it.

"Hello. Oh, hello, George!" Pan watched her friend's face light up as she recognized the voice, and a queer little pain went through her. "What? A dance at your studio? Of course we'll come. Yes—no, I'm feeling splendid, Pan's been treating me the way she treats Frankie. Yes, we'll dress and come right around."

Pan's vision of putting Gloria to bed at ten, with hot milk and a hot water bottle, vanished into thin air. She dressed obediently, watched Gloria don a marvellous rose color silk and swathe herself to her chin with silver tulle—and wondering, admiringly, climbed into the cab with this amazing woman and went off to a late dance. Gloria suddenly looked 16 and the picture of health.

Largest Class Graduated From Bend High School

of "Memory Lane".

In presenting the class, Superintendent G. W. Ager mentioned that it is not only the largest class which has left the local high school, but one which has made an unequalled record, having won the citizenship cup every year since the cup was offered.

Practically all members of the class are planning to continue their education. Ager said, quoting the results of a questionnaire which he had them fill out. Fourteen plan to enter O. A. C., nine will go to normal school, six will go to the University of Oregon and six to other universities; ten will enter special schools, and 12 were uncertain, but only one definitely plans not to go to a higher educational institution.

Why We Sell Merchandise

To make the best use of our electric service you need good, reliable appliances. People sometimes buy a cheap, poorly constructed iron or toaster, for instance, and when it gives trouble they blame the electric service. One reason we merchandise, therefore, is to place the right kind of appliances in the homes of our lighting customers. Buy standard goods. It pays in the long run.
