REPLACE EXPRESS TEAM WITH DELIVERY TRUCK

"Hood" and "Haid" are gone, and in their place a new delivery truck, just out of the factory, winds its way through Bend.

The new truck, of one ton capacity, made its first appearance in Bend yesterday, driven by Glenn Phillips, the same man who drove the boys.

This is the first automobile to be used by the express company since the office was opened here some nine years ago.

C. E. Bertrand, agent for the express company in Bend, explains that his company is gradually motorizing its delivery system in all parts of the country.

In fact, Bend is one of the last cities to replace horses with a truck. The two big bay animals used in Bend for the past year have been sent to Portland.

CONFIDENCES

Chapter 57

"I—I don't think there's much to tell," Pan replied, trying desperately to understand it herself.

"Yes! If she had—liked him as I did, I shouldn't have minded—that is, I shouldn't have minded so much. I suppose I would have selfishly wanted him to be in love."

Her thoughts came pouring out then. For once she could talk freely all the things that were pent up inside her.

"You see, no one ever liked me. Not even when I was a child. I was so frightfully ugly—"

"Poor kid, you weren't," Gloria said softly.

"I was. I was thin and nervous and had a pale face and a big mouth with huge teeth that Aunt Maude called tombstones. And I looked so dreadful in the gingham pinafores Aunt Maude made us. You see, when we were little, she dressed us both alike. That is, Gladys had new pinafores, and I wore them out next season—she was so much larger that they always fit me when she's outgrown them. But her hair went into nice fat curls when Aunt Maude wet it and mine was always plastered back flat and ended in a stringy pigtail. It was so awfully ugly!"

"I always had to work so hard over my lessons, if I didn't study and study I'd fail. But Gladys never paid much attention, and somehow she always managed to get through. So she wasn't stupid, as I know you think."

"There's a certain type of mind that cannot fall into the routine of school studies!" Gloria explained. "Docile children thrive under such a routine; children with too much individuality are always at war with the hard and fast rules of academic studies. I fancy you were that sort."

Pan went on: "All the teachers liked Gladys. They never cared much for me, except an old lady who was my English teacher. The rest said I had no personality. Otherwise, I never made friends—and the teacher died while I was in high school."

"Gladys grew more and more popular, and somehow I felt as though I were being shoved into the background. But I knew that if I were the sort that could be shoved, I deserved to be. And I was busy, the work at home never was very easy. "And as I grew older I grew more play games well, I tired out on long walks, I couldn't swim nor row well, when they talked about—oh flirtations, and the sort of impudent give and take very young men and women like—well, I couldn't do it. The whole trouble was that Gladys and her friends were full of the joy of life, and I had none of it."

"Poor child, how could you?" Gloria wondered.

"But, you see, as life gave me nothing, I grew never to expect anything, that's the consolation of my type." Pan went on, with a keen flash of self knowledge. "So I never was envious and I never looked forward—as Gladys and all the others did. They looked forward to being in love, and being married, to having homes of their own. Some wanted a lot of money, some of the girls and boys wanted to go to other cities to live—when I did think ahead, I felt that somehow, unexpectedly, things would change for me, and would be happier. Meantime, you see I had no money, so I couldn't break away, and no courage to go anyway, because I was so sure I was useless."

"But the unexpected came—through you." She gave Gloria one of her sweet, shy, little smiles and resumed.

"But first of all, something else unexpected came. That was Morton —who liked me. He was my first friend, my only friend, except my father, of course.

"And he did like me, in spite of all my faults and shortcomings. It was—you can't imagine how wonderful to me, because everyone has always liked you—"

"I can imagine, though," Gloria said gently, putting one hand over the girl's.

"I was so—grateful. Then I began to think I could do him good too, by being good friends with him. I thought he was wonderful—"

"That's because you wanted to think so, the idealism in you coming out," Gloria explained.

"Perhaps. But that was the only thing I wanted—to go on being in love with him. And then—Gladys who had everything, wanted the one thing I wanted, and didn't deserve it because she never could appreciate all his good qualities—got it."

"And that's life," summed up Gloria. She wanted to say several things and wondered whether she dared.

Tomorrow—Gloria's Advice.
