NEW YORK, June 4. — Knute Rockne, the wizard football coach and who is almost as capable as an after-dinner speaker, is as modest as he is efficient. On numerous occasions he has publicly minimized the importance of coaching and voiced the opinion that success in developing football teams depends entirely upon the material.

"All I did last season was blow up the football," he said recently in commenting upon the Notre Dame victory eleven. Tad Jones, who has turned out some of Yale's best football teams in the last three years, is another prominent coach who stresses the importance of players over systems of plays, but any one who follows football knows that eleven All-American players would not defeat an ordinary team unless they had something to work on.

The stories of Rockne and Jones, applied to other lines of sport as well as football are interesting, however. The importance of a good second in a fighter's corner, a smart manager on a major league bench or a good trainer with a track team are questions upon which all authorities do not agree. The majority opinions, perhaps, are that success depends upon a combination of both—a good individual and a good instructor or adviser.

It always has been held that Jess Willard would not have lost the world's heavyweight championship to Jack Dempsey in Toledo if he had retained a good trainer and if he had secured some experienced second to back him up in his corner. Big Firpo might have taken the title away from Dempsey if he had been trained properly and if he had been backed by some one smart enough to claim a foul when Dempsey forgot all about the rules in the first round. But on the other hand there are some fighters who could get along without any one in their corner. Tom Gibbons never needs any assistance and Benny Leonard also took care of himself at all times.
