A real fool—He that trusteth in his own heart is a fool, Proverbs 28:26.

DUMP AND DRIVE

In spite of the fact that the city dump is only a few rods further on, there have been, in the past winter, quantities of tin cans and other refuse thrown out by the roadside at the beginning of the Century drive.

Besides the injury done the city by this sort of thing, it is an offense against the interests of The Shevlin-Hixon Company. Unless we are mistaken, the road at the point in question is not a public way but is used by the sufferance of that company.

And while we are on this subject of the Century drive let us say a word about its condition. From the city limits to the forest boundary it was never in worse shape.

HEAL THYSELF

The doctor comes with aird question concerning what I drink and eat; for I have chronic indigestion, which tortures me, from neck to feet. He scolds me if he finds I've eaten some rich spaghetti from a can, or any bread that's white and wheaten, and not composed of tasteless bran.

A VISIT

Chapter 60

The only thing Pan could find to carry hot to the invalid was some thick celery soup. She heated this as much as possible with a lavish addition of cream and poured it into a thermos bottle.

She was so much in earnest over her errand that she took a taxi, an unheard of extravagance for her, so George could have his supper that much sooner.

George had phoned downstairs to the hall boy of the apartment house to let her in—she found him sitting in a little pool of lamp light at the big table in his studio, with books and newspapers scattered over table and floor, and the rest of the huge place in a friendly sort of gloom.

"You are an angel to come like this," he said. "I'm like all men, I hate being sick so much that when I have the least ache or pain I pretend it's something tremendous."

"That's the sort of remark Gloria would make. I believe you are too much under her influence," George replied.

The girl wondered at this answer, it seemed to reflect a trifle upon Gloria. She looked closely at George—who did indeed seem very ill.

One of the big armchairs was placed at the end of the long table. An exquisite lace and linen scarf was thrown across the polished dark oak, coffee in a percolator needed only a light to begin its heating, sandwiches, salad, cold meat, everything his servants could think of to tempt him in their absence, was ready there.

George watched her through the arched doorway. She seemed so at home as she found a tray, and arranged the meal, and as she went back and forth from the butler's pantry, where scalding hot water was ready to heat the plates.

When she carried in the tray, he ate all the hot soup and cold supper with a perfectly healthy appetite, let her put an extra cushion under the bandaged ankle, sent her up to the balcony for a fresh supply of cigarettes, and then leaned back in the armchair, feet out on a stool, hands limply on the chair arms, the cigaret he rarely puffed at held between his fingers.

Pan carried away the tray and the coffee, and came back again. "I feel awkward now for the first time," she said. "That's because I've nothing further to do."

"Now you must sit down on that little stool where I can look at you, and let me amuse you, to pay back for all your nice attentions to me," George said.

Pan sat down obediently, folded her arms around her knees, remembered that was ungraceful and clasped her hands in her lap.

"Don't try to sit in a dignified attitude in an undignified chair," George said. "You look best when you forget yourself, Pan, and on that stool you look very much like a quaint little girl who lived a century ago. I'm going to paint you that way—sometime."

"Pan, do you know, I think you must be the ideal woman!" His eyes were smiling and the mouth that was usually cynical was whimsical.

"Why?" Pan asked. "You look as though you were laughing at me!"

"Bah, now, you're spoiling things by getting self-conscious! I said that because Aunt Harriet would have had no sympathy for me this evening. She would have said, and been perfectly right, that if I wasn't able to walk around, I shouldn't have sent the servants out, and if I intended to be cross and not answer the telephone all day, I shouldn't complain of loneliness in the evening and call you up for sympathy. I'm not very logical for a man."

"I know that," Pan said so innocently serious that George burst out into a genuine laugh.

"Then you're very logical for a woman," he decided. The girl went back to her original puzzle.

"Why did you tell me when I came in that I was too much under Gloria's influence?" she asked. "I suppose I am greatly influenced by her—but wouldn't it be a good influence? She's so—wonderful in every way."

George smiled a little. "Hand me that box of matches—that's it, thanks. Now go sit down on your stool and be a good girl and listen. I'm going to tell you a lot of things about yourself."

Pan felt her heart beat excitedly as she looked at him.

Your Back Bone

A backbone in true alignment means health, because it insures freedom of the nerves through which nature works on the body. Health is, therefore, conserved by the natural bodily resistance against disease obtained in this way. Where the spine is in natural alignment nature itself provides more and better help to safeguard and promote the health than anything else.
