EXPLANATIONS

Chapter 31
 Pan wondered how Gloria could get around this.

For Gloria had built all her miserable theory on Santley's absence and on the fact that she hadn't heard from him. Now it appeared that he had gone at once to New York—presumably to her. This was the time for explanation, and Pan did not want to be present.

She rose, saying with a smile: "It's Frankie's bedtime."
 "Dear me, it's only 5:30," protested Gloria, even before the boy could voice his own objection.

"Yes, but by the time he has his supper and his bath—"
 "It will be 6:30 or less. He doesn't go to bed until seven, and he may stay a little longer today in honor of remembering the acquaintance of his old friend."

"Of course," the child agreed. "I'm going to call you Santley—please can I? I call George and the others by their first names."

His candid dark eyes beamed upon this new friend. Santley smiled at him—his face was lovable when he relaxed into a smile.

"I am honored to be classed with the others," he answered. The two women caught the slight accent of the last word. Gloria flushed the least bit.

"My son is spoiled. I'm afraid, he's too much with grownups, and he picks up odd ways. Frankie, you shouldn't say—"
 "Please don't degrade me by having him call me Mr. Collins—after I've been elevated by him and placed among the others," Santley protested, the last word still slightly accented. There was the merest tinge of sarcasm. Santley was having revenge for Gloria's greeting!

Pan began to see how he could be an extremely clever lawyer. She began to watch this conversational sword play with great interest. This sort of thing Gloria was skilled in, she herself could not do it at all, she was too simple and direct by nature, she said what was in her mind or kept silent.

She began to suspect that Gloria had met her match in Santley. For Santley saw through her little mask immediately. For one thing, he knew years at least."

He went on: "I cabled you—about Frank. There was no use adding details. I thought I would write you them—but I wanted to see you, five years is a long time. Your own idea of coming here was so vague—I supposed you had dropped it. I took passage on the first boat I could get—that is, as soon as I could finish some pressing business I had. I wasn't sure even then I could make the boat, thought I might have to wait over, but managed it at the last moment and had a cable sent you from my office as I left for the boat train. That you missed—had you cabled me, I should have received it."

Reproach was in his voice, but Gloria ignored it.

"I landed, phoned your office and had no reply. I didn't believe that, so went there and the janitor said you had gone for the summer, he thought to Europe. I went to your apartment, which was closed. I hunted up some friends, who told me of your trip, but didn't know your address, as you expected to be moving about and had left none. Bobby gave me your bank, and there I got your mail address in London. Then I had to wait for a boat back, they were crowded, I could only get a slow one. From your bankers here I got your hotel—and here I am."

Pan rose quietly, took Frankie's hand, and led him out of the room. Would Gloria be equal to this occasion, she wondered?

Tomorrow—A Dinner Party.
