woman?"
"How could I have done anything else?" Pan asked simply. "I loved you both—if you think me unselfish, I must tell you that I wouldn't have done this if I hadn't loved the woman too. Think of all Gloria has done for me! If she had saved my life it would be natural enough for me to be grateful to her—she's saved more than my life. She's given me a new life and a happy one, in place of one that was intolerable."
"Dear sweetheart," George sympathized softly. "I know all that. But after all, you gave Gloria more than she gave you—she went for you partly from a generous whim, because she saw what your old life was like and how out of place you were in it—partly because you seemed the ideal person for what she wanted. She had to have someone trust worthy to look after Frankie; trust her business, which meant her income, was neglected, or her child.
"You took better care of the child than even she could, and made her home comfortable, relieved her of a thousand tiny worries. She has neither time nor ability to handle small matters. No, you've done wonders for her.
"You've given her more than that, too—by your sweetness and your unselfishness. You've done a great deal for her—and for me too."
He left his chair, now the matter seemed to be talked out, and walked over to sit by her, taking her hand again.
"I didn't think there was a woman as fine and steady and unselfish as you. I've known so many who weren't. I've been rather cynical about them."
Pan smiled up at him.
"I know—you just used to bother me, it was so cynical while your eyes were so kindly. But either it's changed—or I'm used to it. It seems as charming as the rest of your face—as it is when you smile."
"Perhaps you've changed it by giving me back some of my youthful illusions," George said. "Do you know, Pan, that I haven't kissed you yet, and I've been fairly—"

Chapter 25
Pan went, obediently.
There was a low stool that sat usually in front of the coal fireplace. George leaned over and pulled this in front of his chair, and Pan sat down on it.
"This is like the evening I went to see you and took you supper and upset Gloria so." Pan said as she settled down comfortably and clasped her hands around her knees.
"Yes, do you know I almost told you I loved you then?" He was leaning forward a little, so he was quite near her and looking down at her. "Your complete forgetfulness of yourself and of silly conventions, your desire to make me comfortable—were—well—"

Farmhouse Is Wrecked, Fire Takes Four Lives
VISALIA, Cal., July 16—An explosion early today destroyed the farm house of H. D. Schroeder, four miles west of Dinuba, and in the fire which followed, Schroeder and his four children were burned to death.
Authorities are working on the theory that the explosion was caused by dynamite, although there is said to be no reason to suspect foul play. The bodies of all the victims were found in their beds.
The force of the explosion hurled portions of the large house into an adjoining vinyard.
