If people in the country he visited knew the actual climatic advantages here, there would be a general migration toward Bendward, Kleinfeldt believes.

Chapter 105 DISCOVERIES

"Of course as you got it in Paris, you had to put it on and show it to us," finished George.

"Of course," agreed Gloria serenely.

At 10 Pan went to bed, pretending the pine laden air made her sleepy. "It's part of her charming tact to leave us alone for a bit of gossip," said Gloria when Pan had kissed them both goodnight. "And much as I adore Pan, it's good to gossip a bit with you alone. For one thing—how is it?"

George paused to light a cigarette, give it a long puff to fan it into glowing life, and leaned back, the cigarette as usual between limp fingers. Behind her casually worded question, he knew the amount of friendly anxiety that existed; behind the great black eyes that regarded him with apparent carelessness, he knew there was real concern.

"It's very well," he answered, his tone matching hers for lightness. Then he laughed. "Why? Didn't you think I was what they call a 'marrying man'?"

"No," she answered, turning back to the fire. "You never seemed to be one. I believe I am the only woman you never were superior to, and that's because I never took you seriously. I shouldn't have imagined you would be happy married, though I've always wanted you to marry if there was—well, anyone nice enough."

"Possibly Pan isn't like most women," George answered. "She has depth of character and earnestness. It's fun to watch her grow and to help her. How about you? I never thought you were the marrying sort of woman, as far as that goes."

and vicinity last week, have passed through Central Oregon this season, little damage resulted to grain and alfalfa from this source. The heavy storm which hit Bend was very local in nature, otherwise it would have caused considerable damage. Deschutes farmers, except in a few isolated cases, were able to get their first crops of alfalfa in the stack without getting it wet.

For a time it was feared that haying and harvest work in Central Oregon would be greatly handicapped this year because of a shortage of labor, but information gathered today shows that the fear of a labor shortage has disappeared. One day last week the Bend Commercial club had a call from farmers for 25 men. The knowledge that there was a shortage of farm help evidently spread to the cities, for recently there has been an influx of labor to the Deschutes and Jefferson country.

of the bronze casket in its car, served only to emphasize the depth of feeling with which Dayton saw the last of its champion.

Around the little railroad station before the train pulled out at about 2 o'clock were gathered the simple folk of the Tennessee hills whose cause the Commoner espoused. They came to say a last hushed farewell, leaving the town quiet and deserted behind them. All the ordinary activities of a day were laid aside for a while as every one came to watch the funeral train depart.

In the car where the bronze casket lay in simple state was the widow and Mrs. Ruth Owen, Bryan's daughter, and Major Reginald Owen, her husband, and a few friends. Next to this car was one carrying newspaper men.

Previous to the departure, the casket had been taken from the pleasant little maple shaded cottage where the Bryans lived during the Scopes trial and where the Commoner died, and carried to a railway crossing three blocks away.

The special cars were brought to this point because the railroad station at Dayton sits on land higher than the main street and fears had been expressed there would be some difficulty taking the body up the hill.

Friends of Bryan who had followed him in his last fight for fundamentalism, which taxed his strength to the breaking point, acted as an escort while townfolk of Dayton gathered at the crossing and others at the station, waiting for the departure.
