CAPITOL TONIGHT Friday and Saturday Matinee Every Day Steele of the Royal Mounted by James Oliver Curwood a DAVID SMITH Production with Bert Lytell Stuart Holmes Charlotte Merrim A vigorous, swift moving story of the great North country, told in a style such as only James Oliver Curwood can relate the events of this soul-stirring immensity where deeds of valor and chivalry are daily occurrences. The plot centers around Philip Steele, a millionaire, who wears of the sham and polish of the city, forsakes civilization and attaching himself to the Royal Mounted braves frozen trails and forest dangers to "bring in" his man. Thrill follows thrill, interspersed with bits of humor, touches of human interest or picturesque scenic backgrounds that give the scent of the big pine the clear, invigorating air of high altitudes and the tingle to the blood that comes only in the far North. Continuous Shows on Sunday from 1 to 11, starting September 6th

MAFALDA By John Goodwin

"If the show goes as well as the rehearsal, I think we shall elick, Gareth," said he. The brothers had devoted the whole afternoon to counseling Jill and Mafalda, who had only left the garret half an hour since. "I can't get those songs or Jill Sean-tan's out of my head. What a golden voice she has, and what a charming little girl! She's as fresh and dainty as a wildflower." "A voice the world will hear, especially that top G. But the tiger lily for mine!" said Gareth. "There was something that got hold of me by the throat when she acted through that sketch I wrote for her without a word spoken, and made it twice as good as I ever thought it would be!" Owen's brow knitted. "I make you a prophecy, brother," said he, "she's as likely as not to throw your sketch over and do something of her own. I was watching her. She is an artist, but she is full of herself, she can see nothing but her own personality and her own work. To make a sensation, she wouldn't care if she burned the house down, and herself with it. You mark my words. She might suddenly do a can-can, or kick somebody's hat off. She's all out for surprise, and she'll surprise you tonight!" "I don't care if she does," said Gareth. "You know how dull dear old Dad's parties are, they can do with a little livelier. But I think you exaggerate about Maffie."

"You'll find your mistake. She is one of those rare people who can't be exaggerated, and I don't like her. She is a live wire, an absolute little demon, and as irascible as a cat." "I wish you wouldn't talk about her like that, Owen!" said Gareth sharply. "She's an orphan, and she hasn't a friend in the world except her sister; she's unusual, but she's delightful too. And she's never had a chance on earth!" Owen looked astonished. The twins had never quarreled since they left the cradle. "Sorry, old boy," he said gently. "No doubt you're quite right. Where are the silk socks? I can only find one pair of the beastly things." "There never was but one pair. One of us will have to paint his feet. It's your turn to wear 'em. . . all right then, we'll toss for them." He spun a penny into the air. "Tails!" said Owen. "Tails it is," announced Gareth. "I black my feet. It will save time if you do it for me. Give us a pair of fashionable rent's hose." He sat back in his chair and drew his trouser legs. Owen reverently slipped on the black silk socks, and taking his brushes he mixed some indiar ink with a little gum arabic in a gillipot, knelt before the chair, and deftly painted a pair of black socks with pink clocks over Gareth's ankles and up his legs. "While he was engaged in his professional task there was a tap at the door. Gareth answered cheerfully, and in came Mafalda and Jill. "What on earth are you kids doing!" exclaimed Maffie. Gareth explained the committal pair of socks, and Maffie dropped into a chair and laughed till the tears ran down her cheeks. Jill, who had looked rather frightened when she came in, laughed too. "Do the best people wear pink clocks at night?" asked Gareth, rising and inspecting his feet, which shone with a beautiful silky gloss as the gum dried. He slipped them into a pair of pumps, and admired the effect. "We want to do you both credit." He turned to face the girls and a little gasp of admiration escaped him. "How ripping you look!" It seemed to Gareth that the two sisters were transformed as if by the touch of a wand. History does not record how much of her 150 pounds Jill had spent. But she was clad in a simple but charming little evening frock of white mousseline, with a bunch of superb crimson roses at the waist. Her neck and breast were milk white, but there was a faint flush on her cheeks, and she looked as delightful as a child going to its first party. Owen gazed at her, entranced. Mafalda was much more resplendent and expensive in a low cut, clinging black crepe de chine, relieved with orange, that revealed every line of her figure. All Mafalda's skill in dressmaking and dress choosing were expressed in her costume. The effect was daring, but there was a touch of genius in it that saved it from vulgarity. Maffie carried her clothes with a distinction that was all her own. "Do you think we'll do, boys?" asked Maffie. "Do!" exclaimed Gareth. "You are superb, both of you! A couple of princesses!" "Of Fisher's alley!" laughed Maffie, curtseying. Mafalda was slight with excitement and the sense of adventure. The actress in her was joining hands with the adventuress, and she seized upon the prospect of making a night of it. Jill's eyes were troubled. In spite of the excitement, she resented this masquerade. She felt as if she were about to force an entrance into Sir Tufnell Pembroke's house under false pretenses. Maffie, quick to read emotions on a man's face or a woman's, turned to Jill and saw the fear in her sister's eyes. "What's the matter with you, Jill?" she asked. "Do you think we ought to go, Maffie?" stammered Jill. "I'm feeling scared about it. What right have we to go—what are we to say to the boys' father?" "Why!" exclaimed Maffie, "you talk as if we were a couple of flappers with nothing to recommend us but our glad rags! Don't you forget it, Jill, we are artists, as good as some of the crush that'll be there tonight. What do we get out of it? Some food and a glass or two of bubbly? What do we give the old man? A free show! You're little Tom Tucker—you'll sing for your supper, and as for me, I've something in my sleeve 'll make 'em sit up and take notice. Come on!" (To be continued)

Women's Association Building Plan Heard Representatives of the Tri County Women's association, recently organized for the purpose of erecting a much needed women's building on the grounds of the Deschutes county fair, meeting yesterday afternoon in the Redmond high school heard plans for the new structure and made arrangements to call for bids today. Regardless of the fact that the opening date of the fair is less than five weeks distant, members of the association announce that the building will be erected by October 1. The structure is to be completed in its entirety this fall. Bend women who attended the meeting yesterday in Redmond were Mrs. R. S. Dart, head of the association's finance committee; Mrs. Louis Bennett and Mrs. J. F. Arnold. Another meeting of the association will be held in Bend, in the ladies room of the Elks' building, September 3. In their work through the Central Oregon country, representatives of the association are finding that the need for such a building on the fair grounds as is to be erected this fall is stressed by hundreds of people. Women in Deschutes and parts of Crook and Jefferson county are back of the movement.
