A. RURIC TODD CHARGES DEATH

Ex-Kelso Mayor Swears Murder Warrant

Allegations in Thomas Doversy Case Disregarded, to Ask Special Probe

(U. P. Leased Wire to The Bend Bulletin)
OLYMPIA, Wash., Sept. 21.—A. Ruric Todd and a delegation of seven persons from Kelso were informed today that Governor Hartley was out of the city and would not return until tonight or tomorrow.

Todd is here seeking to have a special prosecutor appointed to press a charge of murder against George Norris, superintendent of the water works at Kelso, for the alleged slaying of Thomas Doversy, newspaper man.

Kelso officials say there is nothing to the charge.

KELSO, Wash., Sept. 21.—A. Ruric Todd, ex-mayor of Kelso, left here today for Olympia for a conference with Governor Hartley, in which he will seek a special investigation of law enforcement in Cowlitz county.

He said he was going to tell the governor that Kelso authorities refused seriously to consider the warrant he swore out for the arrest of George H. Norris on a charge of murdering Thomas Doversy, newspaper man. This, he said, was evidence that law enforcement in Kelso was lax.

Kelso was still excited today over the arrest of George H. Norris, superintendent of the Kelso water-works, on a warrant charging murder and sworn to by A. Ruric Todd, political enemy, and former mayor of Kelso.

Todd charged that Norris murdered Thomas Doversy, editor of the Cowlitz County News, in June. Norris was taken into custody yesterday, but later he was released by Hite Imus, Cowlitz county attorney, who said the warrant was not legal. It was sworn out before W. M. McCoy, Justice of the Peace at Castle Rock, Wash. Imus pointed out that a justice has no power to issue a felony warrant.

Imus said further that there was no evidence involving Norris.

MAFALDA

By John Goodwin

Morton Bell sat down abruptly. John Belhouse, K. C., leaned across and whispered to him. Bell smiled and nodded. The crown counsel, though inwardly none too pleased, continued as though there had been no interruption.

"Tell the jury," said Sir Charles grimly, "what was the nature of this performance of yours? What did it represent?"

"Nature?" replied Mafalda. "It was hot stuff! After comedy, you have to give them the other thing." She smiled knowingly at Sir Charles. "You have to make their flesh creep!"

"And did it?"

"Ask the world if it didn't! You weren't there—you didn't see it. You don't know what it was like!"

"That," said counsel, with deadly persistence, "is what I am asking you. Answer my questions without comment."

He interrogated Mafalda skillfully; she gave her answers briefly, but those who heard her were conscious that the thing was missing fire. The grim little drama that had held the audience spellbound in Sir Tuffnell's drawing room now sounded curiously flat as Maffie repeated it by word of mouth, despite the deftness of Comyn's questions. It was a duel of wits in which the girl in the black held her own amazingly well. She gave nothing away. But the crown counsel's patience was equal to Maffie's.

"Is this a correct description of your performance?" he said deliberately. "A woman, walking alone, is overtaken by a man. There is a quarrel between them; a struggle ensues. She stabs him with the pin from her hat. And realizing what she has done—looking at him as he lies mortally wounded on the ground at her feet—she turns and runs away. Do you agree with that?"

"Really!" exclaimed Bell, arising from his bench, "really, m' lord—"

"It's a pretty thin description," said Mafalda. "But let it go."

"I do not wish to overload or elaborate it. Correct it in any way you choose," said the crown counsel.

"No," replied Maffie contemptuously, "if that's good enough for you—"

"It is not a question of myself. You are making a statement to the jury."

"Well, if the jury is satisfied I am."

"Very well. Now, did you go to Grosvenor Terrace, deliberately intending to show your audience that performance I have just described?" Mafalda hesitated a moment; for the first time.

"No."

"Was it, then, done on the spur of the moment?"

"Yes, in a way, it was. When the encore was called, that was the thing I made up my mind to give them."

"Why?"

"Because it was big stuff—powerful stuff. Because I knew it would knock them better than anything. I could put my whole weight into it—that's why?"

"It was a sudden inspiration—you had never thought of that scene before?"

"No, that's wrong! It had been running in my head for two days—and nights. I'd been thinking it over and I could see—just as I made them see it. It was my own work."

The crown counsel leaned forward.

"Do you tell the jury that that 'work,' as you call it, which was in your head for two days—was not a scene actually described to you 48 hours before, in your home in Fisherman's alley?"

"No."

The girl's small fist struck the rail of the witness box, and her eyes flamed at him. And in that moment Maffie was magnificent.

"It isn't true! There is not one word of truth in what you're suggesting to me."

There was a moment's silence.

"You were setting?" asked counsel. "Acting—and nothing more?"

"Yes!"

Sir Charles kept his eyes fixed on her.

"Are you acting now?" he asked quietly.

"No," replied Mafalda, even more quietly. "When it comes to acting I know when I'm beat—I can't compete with the bar!"

Sir Charles seated himself with the air of a man who has accomplished his task and is well satisfied. And as the sensation—and the laughter—died down, Morton Bell leaned across and whispered to his colleague, who nodded and smiled.

It was Rialto Pete's counsel who rose to cross examine.

Belhouse K. C. hoisted his tall, lean figure upright, and looked at Mafalda for a moment or two before he spoke.

"When did you first hear that Tatham Brough was dead?" he asked.

"The policeman told me, in Sir Tuffnell's house," replied Maffie without hesitation.

"You had no knowledge whatever of that fact, until then?"

"None."

Belhouse glanced at the jury and turned again to Mafalda.

"Where were you, between 10 and 10:30 on the night of the 21st, the time when your sister had this encounter with Brough on Babbitt's wharf?"

"I was indoors," said Mafalda. "I stayed in the sitting room at home."

"Did you leave the house at all that night?"

"No."

Belhouse paused.

"Quite sure of that?" he asked quietly.

"Quite sure," said Mafalda.

"Did you see anything of Pietro Gaete between that time and the arrest of your sister?"

"Yes, once. It was in Fleet Row, Greenwich, about 6 o'clock on the 22nd."

"The 22nd. That was the day following the encounter on Babbitt's wharf, was it not?"

"Yes."

"What did you say to him?"

"I said, 'Pete, what's become of Tatham Brough? Where is he?'"

"What was Gaete's answer?"

"No, I said, 'Pete, if it had been me on the wharf there last night, instead of Jill, I'd have killed him!'"

"And did he answer that?"

"He said, 'It's well you weren't there, then, Maffie, for he wasn't worth it.' And he turned on his heel and went off down the street, and that's the last I saw of him." Maffie's voice, for the first time, faltered and grew husky, "until I heard the police got him."
