JEFFERSON COUNTY REA UNIT TALKED

Redmond, Jan. 21 - Organization of a Jefferson county unit of the Central Oregon REA project is now under consideration, and will be discussed by interested farmers at a meeting Saturday at 2 p. m. at the Jefferson county courthouse in Madras, Clinton A. Becraft, superintendent of the project, said here today.
The proposed addition, Becraft said, would include most of the agricultural land east of the Deschutes river in Jefferson county, with Onal springs as a starting point for the lines and Gateway as the northern end. All of the territory included is land which is slated for irrigation under the North Unit project.
There is a possibility that the Warm Springs district might own the picture as an additional market for power from REA lines which might be built into Jefferson county, according to Becraft.
When steps were first taken in Central Oregon, early last spring, to initiate an REA project, Jefferson county farmers joined with Crook and Deschutes county men to ask for a survey of the proposed project. As finally recommended by REA engineers, however, the cooperative included only Crook and Deschutes county territory.

While the project now being discussed in Jefferson county would have a low number of members per mile of line, Becraft said this number would be no lower than in projects being built elsewhere, while the possible future increase when the North Unit gets into operation would be large.
The Jefferson county lines, Becraft believes, would be much cheaper to build than the lines now being constructed in Deschutes and Crook counties. If Jefferson county farmers complete their membership sign-up and the proposed extension is approved by REA authorities, it is hoped that the present construction contract could be adjusted to include construction of the additional lines.
Homer G. Johnson of Portland, construction contractor for the Central Electric cooperative, now has construction well under way on the 237 miles of line which are being built to serve approximately 500 farmers in Deschutes and Crook counties.
