Co-Eds Display Driving Talent For Army Work

Hartford, Conn., 8/20—Connecticut coeds soon may be driving army trucks—bearing out a prediction of Motor Vehicles Commissioner Michael A. Connor that "properly trained women could safely and efficiently operate heavy army transport trucks ranging in weights up to two and one-half tons."
Connor's conclusion was formed after an experiment conducted at New Britain Teachers college. Women students who had completed a safe driving course conducted by the motor vehicles department took part in the test.
Maj. O. H. Brinkman of the 118th regiment, quartermaster corps, U. S. Army, was one of the witnesses.
"The general performance was such," said Commissioner Connor, "that we were satisfied carefully selected women, properly trained, could well substitute for men in the operation of these types of army vehicles."
He said his office had received many applications from women volunteering for this type work. Connor has asked the army for necessary equipment and permission to train the women volunteers.
