

U. S. Warships Aid in Keeping Sea Lanes Clear

Correspondent Tells Of America's Part in Grin Battle of Atlantic

By Phil Newsom (United Press Staff Correspondent)

Aboard a U. S. Warship on the Atlantic Patrol, Aug. 7 (U. S. Navy Courier to Washington)—United States warships are operating under virtual wartime conditions in carrying out President Roosevelt's instructions to keep America sealanes clear.

This correspondent, among the first to see the Atlantic patrol in action, for the last ten days has covered one of these ships, aboard a ship operated with 800 men, it now operates with 1,000. It before it was 100, it now is nearer 1500.

Not until this ship drops anchor in home port, or under the gravest conditions, will it break radio silence.

Each night the vessels are blacked out, with ports closed and even a cigarette on deck prohibited, lest a tell tale glow give away its position to a potential enemy.

Sensitive listening devices protect against any submarine or airplane.

Even the sea itself, devoid of all activity save that connected with the struggle, gives constant evidence of war.

Eight days out of port a destroyer lookout reported he believed he had seen a very light (a flare). Instantly, guns were manned and searchlights swept the sea. Nothing was sighted and the patrol proceeded on its course, but the next day an empty lifeboat floated past and a few hours later a man's body clad in oil skins was sighted in the water.

Another day, three British destroyers were sighted. They nosed up until certain of our identity, then signalled a greeting and went on.

Naval regulations forbid the use of names of the complements of vessels involved in this patrol, but they are a formidable display of naval might. Officers aboard believe they are sufficient to blast from their path any potential enemy.
