

Hidden Japanese Fleet Believed To Be Crippled

Washington, Jan. 19 (AP)—The Japanese fleet's failure to challenge American landings on Luzon or to interfere with Adm. William F. Halsey's free-wheeling attacks on enemy shipping and bases along the south China coast was taken today as an indication that it may be more seriously impaired than first believed.

Secretary of Navy James Forrestal believes that the Japanese fleet suffered a "broken back" in the mauling it took in the second battle of the Philippine sea last October.

In the two weeks ended Jan. 16, our naval forces alone sent 130 Japanese ships to the bottom, damaged at least 260 others, destroyed 400 planes and damaged 400 more in operations supporting the Luzon campaign.

Navy's Role Told
While these figures highlighted the navy's striking power, Forrestal wanted it understood that the navy had a more important, even indispensable, role in the campaign for reconquest of the Philippines. This role, he said, could be divided into these phases:

1. To conduct the preliminary softening up attacks which made it possible to undertake the invasion.

2. To secure the invasion against the inevitable aggressive reaction of the Japanese fleet, such as last October's big sea battle after the Leyte landing.

3. To protect the supply lines necessary to sustain the army operations and to advance the army up the Philippines by amphibious landings.

Japan Is Goal
The fourth, that involving such operations as Halsey's against the China coast, is to continue the naval offensive, to exploit the advantages of sea and air supremacy obtained in the second battle of the Philippines, and to carry the war close to the enemy's home.

Although there was no explanation for Forrestal's emphasis at this time on the navy's part in the Philippine operation, it was obvious that he was seeking to ameliorate the feeling on the part of many top naval officials that the navy's role was being submerged.

TIRES DEFLATED
Bend police today were investigating the practice of letting air out of tires on automobiles parked in the rear of the Superior club.

Lum Marr, proprietor of the club, told officers that he was a victim of the tampering last night, and that two other cars parked there had been victimized in a similar manner.

Col. Chenoweth

While Colonel Chenoweth is in the California hospital, his family will be near him.

Was At Bataan

Colonel Chenoweth was stationed in the Philippines when war broke out, and was with the Americans who were captured at the fall of Bataan. The officer, graduate from Bend high school and West Point, wears three presidential unit citations, three campaign stars, various theater of operations ribbons and the purple heart ribbon. Reported to have been rather gaunt when he escaped from the Japanese prison ship through the hole made by an American torpedo, Colonel Chenoweth has regained lost weight, and is now quite a bit heavier than the lithe youth, who as a Bend high school student, competed on Central Oregon tennis courts more than a decade ago.

This much Colonel Chenoweth could say about the torpedoing that preceded his rescue in the Philippine islands, following two years in Japanese prison camps: "I was in the hold of the ship," he said of his escape in Philippine waters from the prison ship. "The impact of the torpedo explosion was terrific." He and another soldier, a Lieut. Pfeiffer, scrambled upward to the top deck and slipped into the water from the listing ship.

Lt. Col. Chenoweth refused to comment on the assistance rendered by the Philippine guerrillas, explaining that he had instructions

Othman Gets Bid to Fourth Inauguration of Roosevelt

By Frederick C. Othman (United Press Staff Correspondent)

Washington, Jan. 19 (AP)—I don't know about this inauguration deal tomorrow, I got a yellow ticket to get in, all right, but it looks like I'll be standing in the mud with about 7,000 other guys in the president's back yard.

There's a question whether my ticket will get me inside for lunch on the house afterwards, but the more I hear about this repeat, the less I'm beginning to care. Frankly, I don't think the Roosevelts are going to have enough to eat.

You know how it is between husbands and wives. The husband's always inviting the gang to have a bite. The president asked 2,000 people in for a snack (he said something about chicken a la King) and turned that part of the program over to his wife.

Well sir, chicken's hard to get. As I understand it, the housekeeper vetoed the a la King business and substituted chicken salad, which can be eked out with hard-boiled eggs, of which there are plenty, and chopped-up celery. Everybody gets one small dab of salad. Mrs. R. hopes nobody asks for seconds. She will have plenty of coffee, however, and a couple or three mugs of that should carry the customers over until tea time.

As soon as lunch is over the dishwashers will get busy on those coffee cups and hope to have 'em ready for tea at 4:30 p.m., when 1,500 more people drop in.

Some of these, like governors, electors, and their wives, will be repeaters. They'll get cakes with their tea and all those cups'll have to be washed again. Kind of gives you the willies to think of all that dish washing. I believe I'd use paper cups.

As for the mud in the back yard during the inaugural ceremony, that's inevitable. I dropped by for a look see at the place and I can say flatly that the president's lawn is not in good shape. The grass is thin, the earth is soggy, and what 14,000 feet are going to do to it isn't good. About half of these feet will have high heels. There's nothing harder on grass.

Nobody gets to sit down, except the holders of red cards, who are the special big wigs; they'll be on the back porch with the president and if it rains, they'll have a roof over 'em.

The other guests, holding blue, salmon, white, yellow and brown cards, will stand outside and if the heavens open up, they will be out of luck, because they won't be allowed to bring umbrellas. That's so there'll be no eyes poked out.

Nobody has to wear striped pants unless he feels like it. Some of the ladies will look extra fancy. I have studied the photos of Mrs. Roosevelt in her inaugural dress and I think it looks fine. Only frumpy about it is a kind of sash.

Between lunch and tea Mrs. Roosevelt will run upstairs and change into her reception dress. I have seen no pictures of this, but the fashion editors claim it is something neat in pink with a lace jabot. I'll let you know later, after I see it, what a jabot is.

As an old attender of Roosevelt inaugurations (I nearly drowned in 1937) I know what I'm going to wear: rubbers and a fireman's hat.
