

Super Highways Due Motorists In Peace Epoch

Washington, Jan. 23 (AP)—Post-war motorists, who want fast inter-city travel and unobstructed highways for long-distance motoring, may look forward to 40,000 miles of modern four and six-lane highways.

The public roads administration has been authorized by law to construct this new interstate highway system after the war and is now at work, in cooperation with state authorities on plans and locations for the roads.

A spokesman told the United Press that the new highways will be similar to those constructed just before the war as far as surface materials are concerned. However, science has discovered in the past few years better methods of constructing durable bases for the roads.

Plan Presented

The present plans call for a system of roads whereby traffic flow will be uninterrupted by cross streams of traffic and traffic lights. Within cities, the main highways in some places will be either elevated or depressed to avoid interference from city traffic. If, however, there will be means of leaving or entering the highways at appropriate intervals with merging flows of traffic.

The spokesman said that the main problem faced in the planning of the new roads is the congestion of traffic to and from large cities. The majority of the cars travelling the roads are going in and out of the cities—not on long-distance trips. Therefore, while there will be circumferential roads which by-pass large cities for use of through traffic, the main system will go through the cities.

Models Mentioned

The new highways the spokesman said, would be patterned along those already constructed around New York City and ones such as the Pennsylvania turnpike—most recent express highway built in the east.

The plans call for roads in every state connecting all cities of 100,000 or more, as well as some new roads between smaller cities. Some of the highways not built will be incorporated in the new system, or the new highways will be built on the beds of the old roads, but in most cases the roads will be entirely new in order to obtain the most direct flow of traffic.

The post-war highways program will take several years to complete, but construction will begin as soon as conditions permit.

Another post-war project will be the repairing and renewing of obsolete roads, now maintained at high cost by the states because no work could be done during the war.
