100,000 Germans Still Holding Out In French Ports

By Joseph W. Grigg (United Press War Correspondent) Paris, Jan. 25 (Delayed) (Property all attempts to black them out, more than 100,000 well equipped Germans still are holding out in Atlantic coast ports six months after the liberation of rest of France.

The enemy in this "forgotten front" is estimated to have at least a year's supply of food and huge stores of ammunition with heavy artillery and tanks. Also they are reported to be regularly supplied by might-flying planes and submarines, even receiving reinforcements and specialist of-

Besieging the deeply entrenched and powerfully fortified German perimeters are rugged, ill-clad, almost shoeless troops of the French forces of the interior under the command of Gen. Eduard de Larminat. Not Well Equipped

The French are equipped with only a scratchy assortment of German, French, British and American rifles and tommy guns and a few pieces of light artillery. Around Saint Nazaire on the west coast, 40 miles west of Nantes, they are aided by a small number of United States troops.

The perimeter of Dunkirque is contained mainly by Canadians. The continued existence of these nazi pockets, in which it is estimated about 100,000 French civilians are still living under nazi rule, has become a source of bitterness to France generally and is seriously hampering the country's economic recovery. country's economic recovery
