Rhine Bridges

Americans were moving up to the bank along a 12-mile front opposite Duesseldorf and Duisburg.

The flight of the Germans from the Rhineland area west of the river was described in some quarters as a debacle. Canadian First army forces pushing southeastward toward the American spearheads were expected here to make the junctions at any time.

Reports reaching London and Paris newspapers, which headquarters spokesmen saw no reason to question, said American skirmishers were across the Rhine at a number of unspecified points of the Ninth army line.

Elements of three Ninth army divisions were deploying along the west bank of the Rhine between Neuss and Krefeld, trading shot for shot with German gunners on the far side. At the same time, Berlin said powerful British armored forces were massing in the Emmerich area 50 miles to the north for a major attempt to hurdle the great river barrier.

Behind the blazing Rhine front, the Ninth army's armored and infantry divisions were slashing through the 21-mile-wide Rhine-Meuse corridor at breakneck speed, chopping up by-passed German units and driving within five miles of a juncture with the south-bound Canadian First army.

A big segment of the German 15th army faced destruction in the fast-closing Canadian-American trap, and tens of thousands more were in headlong flight across the Rhine under savage aerial and artillery bombardment.

Death Fight Looms Another large German force, cut off by the Ninth army breakthrough to the Rhine, was reported racing southward toward Cologne in an attempt to join the beleaguered garrison for a death fight in the ruined cathedral city.

Cologne itself was under heavy artillery fire from American First army forces driving in through the Nazi defenses five miles to the west.

Lt. Gen. William H. Simpson's American Ninth army wiped out the last German resistance in the Rhine crossing cities of Neuss and Krefeld and late reports said the river bank between the two cities was rapidly being cleared by elements of three Yank divisions.

Hundreds of giant field guns massed behind the American vanguards were bombarding a vast arc of the Ruhr valley's arsenal cities, and Simpson's entire offensive front was wheeling northward to join the Canadians and close off the entire Rhineland.

TYRO LANDS BIG ONE Vancouver, Wash. (AP)—For a beginner, David Bennett is doing okay, as a fisherman. His first attempt to catch a steelhead resulted in his landing just about the biggest specimen ever hooked in this area. It measured 41 inches and weighed 25 pounds. Most anglers are lucky to get a 10- or 15-pounder.
