Bend Tank Leader Sees Iwo Action

Two Jima—(delayed)—"There's no telling how many Japs we've killed," said Marine Platoon Sergeant Leon W. Shupe of 627 Ogden avenue, Bend, Ore., as he told of the work of the battered but hard-battling third tank battalion of the third marine division.

Sgt. Shupe, who had three tanks under his command, helped to knock out a Jap pocket of resistance at the western end of Motoyama Airfield No. 2. It consisted of a tank buried to the turret and a dozen pillboxes with connecting trenches.

"That fight was a slugging match," he said. "It cost us six temporarily disabled tanks. Two of mine, including my own, were knocked out. The Japs used anti-tank and dual-purpose antitank and anti-aircraft guns on us. My tank was hit once by artillery and once by a mortar.

"In dealing with pillboxes and caves here," he continued, "we drive our tank up to the entrances and pour in the high explosives and flames. We never know how many Japs we wipe out."

This is Sgt. Shupe's second campaign. He previously took part in the recapture of Guam.

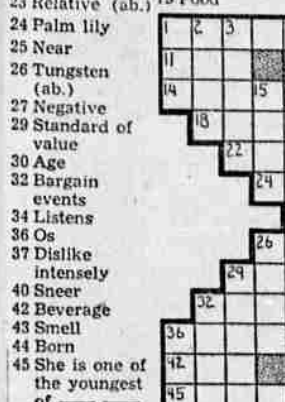

Twenty-one-year old, he is the son of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Shupe, of the Bend address.

Troops Trained in Bend Area See Tough Action in Europe

With the Fifth Army, Italy, March 19—The "sneak and peek" men of the 91st cavalry reconnaissance troop, which trained at Bend, Camp Adair and Camp White before going overseas, have spent much of their time as uninvited guests of Kesselring's forces.

The Oregon-trained men, a unit of the 91st "Powder River" division, are always out in front, either on reconnaissance, as a contact element or as infantry. But their business is to be out in front and out in front they stay.

The cavalrymen were in their favorite spot—out front—with the first troops that entered Leghorn. They were with the doughboys who were the first to reach the banks of the Orno river, and among the first Americans to gaze on the leaning tower of Pisa.

Their "spam-can" armored cars rolled with the first troops into Marina di Pisa.

And all the training these rugged leaders of the Italian campaign received was in Oregon.

It was in the summer of 1942 that 17 enlisted men left their 91st reconnaissance squadron to form the 91st reconnaissance troop on the reactivation of the 91st division at Camp White, Ore.

The troop received preliminary training at Camp White and participated in the Bend, Ore., maneuver. Then they, along with the rest of the division had final training at Camp Adair, Ore., before departing for Africa in April, 1944. Landing in Africa in the early part of May, the troops underwent a month of intensive training before setting out for Italy.

The unit received its first baptism of fire near the famous resort town of Rosignano, where drivers, mechanics, liaison and radio men alike had their first skirmish with the enemy. Since that time the troopers have seen more than 160 days of frontline duty.

A typical piece of action against the Jerries was in the vicinity of Pietramala, north of the Gothic line, after they had rolled on with
