

Dusting Solves Weevil Threat

Greater production of the much needed ladino clover seed is in prospect in Oregon this year as the result of successful experiments with the control of the clover leaf weevil, which had threatened the entire ladino clover seed industry in Deschutes and Crook counties, O. S. C. officials announce.

Use of 40 per cent commercial calcium arsenate at the rate of 30 to 40 pounds per acre has given almost perfect control, according to a new station circular of information No. 357 by B. C. Thompson, associate entomologist at Oregon State college. Although this pest so far has been found only in Deschutes and Crook counties, it was a potential menace to ladino clover seed production throughout the state, says Thompson.

The dust is applied during the first warm weather of early spring, when the plants begin to show green. Thompson cautions against pasturing dusted clover as calcium arsenate is also poisonous to livestock.

Weevil larva attack the plants as growth begins in early spring and in many cases kill the entire field or reduce the stand so that profitable seed production is not possible.
