

Diseases Borne By Air Transport Seen No Threat

By Dennis Dalton
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

Cleveland (AP)—Americans need have no fear of contagious diseases brought to this country by ocean liners and air travel after the war, according to Dr. James A. Doull, medical consultant for the United Nations relief and rehabilitation administration.

Dr. Doull, professor of hygiene and public health at Western Reserve university here, said the United States has adequate means of controlling cholera, yellow fever, typhus fever, smallpox and other diseases that can be carried in international traffic.

Danger to the Orient

However, he said that in other nations, particularly India and the Orient, the transmission of yellow fever presents the greatest danger because millions of people in those areas have never been exposed to the disease and therefore have not built up any immunity.

Eighteen of the United Nations have signed and placed in effect for the next two years the international sanitary conventions of 1944 amending the international sanitary convention of 1926 and the international convention for aerial navigation of 1933, he said. The signature of the United States must be ratified by the senate.

Dr. Doull, who was sent to London by UNRRA a year ago to organize the committee of experts to draft the conventions in their new form, said one of the important achievements was a small pocket-size book of standard vaccination certificates to be carried by passengers and crews to certify their status as protected against various diseases.

International 'Book'

The aim is to have all travel agencies provide prospective travelers a book of "international certificates of inoculation," against cholera, yellow fever, typhus, and "certificates of vaccination" against smallpox and other contagious diseases, Dr. Doull said.

He pointed out, however, that the amended conventions just signed will expire in two years and "it is hoped that before the expiration of that period, either the international office of public health in Paris will resume its pre-war functions or possibly a new international agency will be
