DONATES 70-YEAR SCARF Brazil, Ind. (UP) — The yarn may be old—70 years old at that—but it's still serviceable. At least that is what John F. Cross decided when he gave a knitted red scarf he had worn for 70 years to be ripped up and used as yarn for the 44th Afghan Brazil war mothers knit for sick and disabled soldiers.

The Seabees, those fighting engineers who are writing their chapter of this war with bulldozers and tractors, had grown from an experimental group of 99 men in October, 1941, to 262,000 men a few months ago, Flying magazine notes. More than 100,000 of these men who build under fire are already overseas—mostly in the Pacific theater.

Wartime Studies For Agriculture Reviewed at OSC

Agricultural research during the 1942-44 biennium has been an integral part of the war program in Oregon, with practically all projects adjusted and geared to the war situation, says R. S. Besse, assistant director of the experiment station, in the biennial report just issued as required by law.

In accordance with wartime conditions, including paper shortages, the report is brief and issued in mimeographed form as circular of information No. 346. "The huge backlog of research results, together with those currently achieved, have helped make it possible for Oregon farmers to meet their unprecedented war production goals," Besse reports. "The farmer's ability to produce today the immense quantities of food that he has provided is largely a result of the combined cooperative and joint research of the U. S. department of agriculture and the Oregon station working together."

Projects Studied The report shows that 267 different projects were under investigation during the biennium. These were grouped under the six heads of increasing war food production, converting food crops into forms required by the army and navy, helping relieve the manpower shortage, measuring nutritive values of Oregon-grown food crops, helping provide critical war materials or substitutes, and preparing for postwar reconstruction.

Only brief reference is made to specific accomplishments during the biennium, although some examples are given under each of the six general headings. Regarding substitutes for scarce high protein feeds, for example, the report tells of finding that Austrian winter field peas are well utilized by dairy cattle, and of how feeding tests showed what vegetable proteins could be substituted for animal proteins in poultry feeding.
