State Trained Timberwolves Lauded By Gen. Terry Allen

How troops trained in the IV army's maneuver in 1943 over the rugged terrain of Central Oregon excelled in battle against the Germans, is related in a letter addressed by Gen. Terry Allen to members of his Timberwolves division. A copy of the letter was received recently by Mrs. Martha Elder, of the Elder ranch north of Bend, from her nephew, Cpl. Richard D. Gibson, a Timberwolf.

The Timberwolves division trained for a number of weeks in the midstate area, undergoing some of the most rigid war games. The letter follows:

April 23, 1945

To All Timberwolves:

This date marks the completion of continuous combat for the Timberwolf Division. You may well be proud of your combat record. In its initial operation, the division fought with the First Canadian army into Holland from 23 October to 8 November 1944, spearheading the I British corps in the crossing of the Mark river and the drive to the Maas river. The esteem in which the Timberwolves were held by our British allies is indicated by the following extract from a commendation received from Lieutenant General G. G. Simonds, commanding the First Canadian army: "Once the Timberwolves got their teeth into the Boche, they showed great dash, and the British and Canadian troops on their flanks expressed the greatest admiration for their courage and enthusiasm. When they again meet the Boche 'all hell cannot stop the Timberwolves.'"

The division then moved immediately to the Aachen sector in Germany, where it relieved the 1st infantry division, in the VII corps of the First U. S. army. The Timberwolves jumped off 16 November in the drive to the Roer, with the veteran 1st and 4th infantry divisions and the 3rd armored division. The true combat effectiveness of the Timberwolves was clearly indicated by the following extract from a commendation from Lt. General J. Lawton Collins, commanding the VII corps: "The mission of seizing the great industrial area Eschweiler-Weisweiler-Stolberg, which was assigned to the 104th division (Timberwolves) was a difficult, nasty task. The division cleared this important area in a much shorter time than I had expected, and with the minimum loss. The speed with which this was accomplished is a tribute to the leadership, dash and sound training of the division. The second phase involved the crossing of the Inde river and the advance to the Roer was even more difficult, but characteristic skill and dash, in a series of brilliant night attacks, the 104th (Timberwolves) division forced a crossing of the Inde and in a few days had cleared its entire sector to the Roer river.
