CHARTING A COURSE FOR THE WAR BRIDE

The war bride has an uncharted course to follow, and most of the advice which is showered upon a young married woman is of no value to her. The reason, of course, is that marriage is normally a state of being together while the war marriage is a state of being apart.

The woman of courage will be able to manage, however, if she has, as Wordsworth says, "A few sound instincts and a few plain rules."

If the soldier husband is able to live at home part of the time, the best rule, now as always, is: "Set up a home of your own." It is not important that the home should be elaborate or properly and completely furnished. Who can do that, with priorities and taxes staring them in the face? What does matter is that a couple should have a separate establishment, working out their own destiny without too much interference from their parents.

For the most part, it is not possible for the war bride to live with her husband. Indeed, if he is shipped from camp to camp in this country, a sound rule for her is not to follow her husband around. This is rarely satisfactory; the wife is not content if her husband can give her little time, and she faces the difficulty of pulling up stakes constantly. He can provide her at best only with a travesty of a home.

As a rule, a newly married couple begin their adjustment to one another and to married life in the privacy of their own home or apartment. In wartime, many of them are attempting to make this delicate adjustment under impossible conditions, without privacy, in Army camps where living conditions are crowded and unpleasant, or in the home of one of them, surrounded by the family.

There is no security, no sense of permanency, only an atmosphere of strangeness and discontent. Separation awaits them at any moment. It is certainly the exceptional, not the average, marriage which can survive these weeks of distorted living.

The third rule for the war bride is "Keep in touch with your husband's family." This is particularly important in wartime when the serviceman needs, in the midst of chaos and violence, to know that there is harmony at home. The war bride should make an effort to be friends with her husband's family and to see them frequently if she can. Reassuring news of this kind can do wonders at setting a fighting man's worries at rest and building his morale.

It is absurd for a young couple to marry with the short-sighted idea, "I am marrying you, not your family." The family, on both sides, will inevitably prove to be an important factor in your life.

No bride can afford to forget that, henceforth, like it or not, her life is going to be closely bound up with "the whole connection of the individual man." It is extremely important, therefore, that the couple shall be congenial with their in-laws. If there are strong antagonisms on either side, better stop and reconsider. For the fourth rule is "Keep on good terms with your in-laws."

The deep-lying importance of solving the in-law problem intelligently appears when we learn that—whatever the ostensible reasons given in court—more divorces are caused by the interference of in-laws or by the necessity of having the parents, either of the husband or the wife, living with their married sons and daughters, than from any cause.
