

Week Old Strike Bites Deep Into Nation's Economy

Pittsburgh, Nov. 27 (AP)—Sugar refineries and whiskey distilleries felt the pinch of the coal shortage today and an official of U. S. Steel predicted that some of that corporation's plants would be closed entirely if the walkout of 400,000 soft coal miners continued much longer.

The week-old strike hit deep into the nation's economy but industrialists predicted that drastic cutbacks in steel dependent industries would be announced shortly, possibly this week end.

The Great Western Sugar Co. of Denver said it would close four of its best processing plants this week end and Schenley Distilleries near Pittsburgh reported it might be forced to suspend operations because of a shortage of coal.

Steel Hard Hit
The steel industry continued to be hardest hit. The American Iron and Steel Institute revised its estimate of this week's operating rate downward. The latest estimate was 62.5 per cent of capacity, more than 30 per cent below last week's output.

Irving S. Olds, chairman of the board of directors of the U. S. Steel corporation, said the company's coal stocks were "almost non-existent" and predicted that some plants will be closed entirely if the mine strike continues.

The drastic cut in steel production threatened early cuts in production of automobiles and other steel-dependent industries. They were expected to be announced this week end.

Schools To Close

Schools in Sharon, Pa., and Lansing, Mich., expected to close. Schools at Denver, Walla Walla, Wash., and Provo, Utah already have closed for lack of fuel.

States of emergency have been proclaimed in Utah, Kentucky and Maryland. Many other states reported fuel stocks at a dangerously low point.

The Cleveland Electric Illuminating Co. announced a 50 per cent cut in power output effective December 7, when it will have only 10 days' supply of coal left.

Bend Area Gets National Mention

"In all my travels in Oregon, I never rode over a highway that did not reveal glorious scenes, whether in the rain forest of the coast, the Willamette valley, the high mountains or the arid plateaus of the east" — such is the tribute paid to this state by Leo A. Borah in the current issue of the National Geographic magazine. In preparing the article, "Oregon Finds New Riches," Borah, member of the National Geographic editorial staff, made two visits to the state.

When covering the state, Borah made one of his trips out from Bend, covering the Bend-Burns-Lakeview triangle. Bend comes in for mention in the article, and two full-page pictures, in color, are devoted to this area. One picture is of the Bend sawmills and the other was taken in the Crooked river gorge, with the weird spires of the Smith rocks forming the background. Most of the pictures used in illustrating the article were taken by Ray Atkinson, Portland photographer.

Sawmills Noted
"Two of the largest sawmills in the west are in Bend," Borah writes. "Despite its busy manufacturing, however, the town is a mecca for sportsmen and lovers of mountain scenery. From our windows in a fine old inn set in a garden of flowers we could see across the garden the still glory of the Three Sisters and a host of neighboring snow peaks."

Lava butte of the Deschutes basin also comes in for attention. It was when Borah was on top of this butte, on his first trip to Oregon in May, 1945, that a sudden electric storm enveloped the old volcano. Hair and snow piled up to a depth of five inches. However, before the storm closed in, Borah was able to glimpse the western Cascades, and he refers in his article to "the matchless skyline of 14 snow peaks that glistens over Bend."

Atkinson's pictures used in connection with Borah's article are in a special section of the magazine labeled "Where Rolls the Oregon."
