GRANGE BULLETIN AND CVA

Let us begin what we have to say today by quoting the first few paragraphs of an editorial titled "Floods and a CVA" that appeared recently in the Oregon Grange Bulletin. We quote:

The Grange has asserted that this year's devastating flood re-emphasizes the need for a centralized regional authority to direct a unified program for harnessing the water resources of the Pacific Northwest.

The Portland Oregonian was quick to scoff at this statement, suggesting that the Grange was using the flood as "an emotional peg" upon which to hang its assertion.

Of a certainty, the flood was a "peg" upon which to hang an argument for a CVA. As to it being "emotional" as opposed to "logical," we will leave that to be answered by those who had their farms and homes destroyed and damaged by waters which could have been held in check by dams at Hell's Canyon, Hungry Horse, Glacier View, Paradise and Albeni Falls—dams which are not now built because we do not have a CVA.

But in one breath the Oregonian opposes this type of river development and in the next admits that Hell's Canyon alone would have reduced the river crest by more than a foot.

These paragraphs and those that follow in the Grange Bulletin provide a typical example of that paper's method of argument and discussion. Long experience has taught us that the Grange Bulletin will not engage in clean debate.

To call publications like the Oregonian and the Bulletin stooges of the private power companies proves nothing so far as flood control is concerned. As a matter of fact we doubt if the Grange editor knows the meaning of the word but that point aside he might call such publications a dozen names and still make no contribution to the flood control problem.

We have been in fairly close touch with the pros and cons of the CVA argument ever since Senator Mitchell introduced his bill, S.460, back in February, 1945. At no time has any particular point been made of flood control as an important feature of a CVA.

The Grange Bulletin makes no choice as to whether the pro-CVA argument is emotional or logical but, of a certainty, it goes in for the rhetorical. And the reader will observe that in raising its voice for the down stream victims of the flood it indicates its willingness to destroy permanently and beyond all possibility of restoration the farms and homes of those living in the valleys up-stream from the Glacier View, Paradise and Albeni dam sites.

Those dams, the Grange Bulletin says, are not now built because we do not have a CVA and that seems to us to be stretching things a bit. Hungry Horse, which the grange publication puts in the same category, is actually under construction.

The Grange Bulletin quotes what it calls "a most amazing statement" made in this column and says that we should brush up on our ABC's (sic) of river development. "How anyone can truthfully say that flood control and power generation are incompatible," says the Bulletin, "is beyond comprehension".

We said: The fact is, of course, that flood control and power development conflict in reservoir use. If a dam is to serve flood control purposes the reservoir space back of it must be kept empty against the time the waters to be controlled come down to fill it.

More than once in our discussions with the Grange Bulletin we have asked questions that, be believed, if answered would help to clarify things.

Washington Column

By James Thrasher (NEA Washington Correspondent)

An article in the Daily Worker, New York's communist newspaper, has come up with an explanation of the Berlin "crisis" which its author carefully keeps in quotation marks throughout.

This is an interesting statement, particularly since the article makes no effort to perpetuate the fiction that the blockade of Berlin is due to railroad repairs, broken canal locks, and so on.

The Worker, like every other communist publication and individual, gets its cue on important policy from the propaganda toolbox in Moscow.

The article, not surprisingly, is a little careless in matters of fact. For instance, it implies that the proposed government for western Germany is a part of the Marshall plan, which of course it is not.

But he will not gain where he needs to gain most, that is among the independent voters, nor will he, regardless of party, increase throughout the country the popular respect for his standards of statesmanship, or administration as to the quality of his political method.
