

Glass Island King Quits as Times Disrupt Realm

By Charles J. McDonnell
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

Dublin (U.P.)—Glass island, a poverty-stricken democratic "monarchy," has a new king.

Glass island is in the center of Lough (lake) Conn in fabled County Mayo. It is a dot of land fit for potato growing, of sorts, and little else.

Before the war, Glass island was a flourishing community. Its 40 inhabitants swore allegiance to their uncrowned king and took pride in the trout fishing around their shores.

Anglers from many parts of the world came to the Lough and the island folk supported themselves largely by rowing the visitors and handling their rods and lines.

Anglers Stop Coming

With the outbreak of war, the anglers stopped coming. Glass island started hitting the skids. Its population dwindled. Its men joined the army. Its womenfolk migrated to the "mainland" to work in the war plants or join families from which they long had been separated.

Now only seven persons inhabit Glass island, besides its monarch, 65-year-old Pat Barrett, who donned his crown recently after his "election."

The previous king was James Durkan, 75. Several months ago he tired of his existence, and left for the mainland to spend his remaining days with his daughter, no longer burdened with the worries which beset a king.

King's Loss Felt

The island people felt gravely the loss of their king, to whom they had turned for guidance on practically all matters. They decided to elect a successor, and Barrett was selected.

Barrett is an early riser, a tanned dirt farmer who shies when approached by "foreigners."

King Pat holds no great hope for the future of his kingdom.

"It is true," he said, "that the former king deserted us, but then most of my people are leaving the island, anyhow."

"In a few years they'll all be gone, but I won't leave. No matter what comes or goes, I'll stay until things have passed from my control and they carry me out in a coffin."

Republican Lends Hand To Democratic Foe

Pekin, Ill. (U.P.)—Politics gave way to the golden rule when a republican congressional candidate helped his democratic opponent change a tire.

County judge Harold Velde, the republican, was driving to a political meeting at Princeton, Ill., when he saw a car parked beside the road. He stopped to learn that the troubled motorist was his opponent, Dale Sutton, also driving to a rally.

Sutton borrowed Velde's jack and together they changed the tire.

Then they went their separate ways.

Whole Town Used In Tooth Tests

Askov, Minn. (U.P.) — Minnesota dentists and the U. S. public health service are preparing to use the whole Askov child population as their experimental subjects.

Tooth decay has been serious in tiny Askov for years. The town's 312 persons have had no dentists to serve them. They asked help to check the chronic trouble of the entire community.

With use of the newly-applied chemical, sodium fluoride—reported by members of the American Dental association to cut decay by 40 per cent in children—and with other new techniques, dentists will move into Askov this month.

They will treat all children's teeth with sodium fluoride, furnish preventive care free, teach use of diatomic ammonium phosphate (which creates free ammonia to neutralize mouth acids when brushed on the teeth); undertake diet control; handle all routine tooth care, and educate the town through movies and lectures on care of the mouth.

The sodium fluoride will be applied to mouths at four-year intervals, the proper time lapse between treatments, according to experimenters. For 10 years the public health service most of the estimated $10,000 annual total.

Results, experimenters said, will be valuable in establishing how effective a community project can be.
