

Squid Finding Favor as Food

Monterey, Cal. (UP)—To most people it's just a wriggly horror, but the long-armed squid is landing on more and more domestic dining room tables.

The jet-propelled relative to the lowly clam long has been caught commercially here for use as bait and for sale as food to foreign and local markets. Recently, though, dealers report nationwide sales have increased.

One possible reason for the increased use is the cheapness, about 15 cents a pound.

Most of the squid caught here are small, but once in a while fishermen find a giant in their nets. One squid measures more than 11 feet from tip of tentacle to tip of tentacle.

The squid, frequently confused with the octopus, has a narrow body, eight arms and two long tentacles. The two tentacles, equipped with suction discs to lock them together and studded with swiveled hooks, are used to seize passing fish for food.

The arms take the food from the tentacles, draw it up under the body and there the squid tears the food apart with its parrot-like beak.

It propels itself by drawing water in through openings back of its head, then expelling the water through a small tube. The tube may be pointed in different directions, controlling the direction of travel.

For eating, the squid may be prepared in a variety of ways. The tentacles, arms and body mantle may be fried or stuffed or broiled. It also is boiled sometimes for use in salads.

Winnipeg, Canada, claims to be the geographical center of North America.
