Before you plan a Christmas long distance call

Please remember many calls will be delayed

Here are some facts you should know... Christmas Eve and Day is everybody's favorite time for calling the folks back home...and we'll do our level best to put through as many calls as we possibly can. But in spite of all we can do, lines will be crowded...calls will stack up...and some of our telephone customers are bound to be disappointed.

We'll be on duty to serve you

Every available switchboard will be in service. Thousands of telephone people will be on the job all through the Christmas week-end, doing their best to get calls through so that you may talk to friends and relatives. We'll be able to take care of a large part of the demand for long distance service because of careful, advance planning and special circuits. But the fact is: Long Distance lines simply can't carry the tremendous volume of traffic originating at Christmas—by far our busiest time of the year. We expect to be asked to put through more than three times as many calls between distant points as on a normal day.

Best time for greeting calls

Most calls before or after the Christmas weekend will go through while you hold the line. But during this weekend there are apt to be delays, and we may not be able to reach your party at all. You may be sure that thousands of Long Distance operators will be doing their very best all through the Holidays.
