State Convention of AAUW To Be in Bend April 21-22

Bend is to be host to the American Association of University Women at their state convention, April 21-22. The state president, Mrs. R. E. McCormack of Corvallis, was here this past week end to help launch plans for the event.

At a luncheon in the Trailways coffee shop Saturday, Mrs. McCormack announced that Dr. Phoebe Morrison of the national headquarters staff, associate on international relations, will be here for the convention, accompanied by Mrs. Eric Johnston of Spokane, regional vice-president.

The convention-planning session followed a program on the association's fellowship activities. Speakers included Mrs. William Niskander and Miss Zola McDougall, as well as Mrs. Craig Coyner, who arranged the program. It was brought out in a panel discussion that Oregon AAUW branches raised $14,000 last year for fellowships to provide advanced study for outstanding women. The northwest area raised $40,000, while the national organization as a whole raised $117,000.

Mrs. Coyner quoted a statement, "Under the pressure of war, science jumped ahead 500 years." This means, she said, that we are 500 years behind in the knowledge of how to live together in a world which has the A-bomb and the H-bomb. Miss McDougall told how AAUW is trying to meet this challenge by giving more fellowships in the field of social studies.

Mrs. C. E. Stranahan, president, announced convention committees. The list follows:

She built her talk around six points which, she stressed, are necessary for mental maturity. Coal Mines Seek Young Men, Recruits Prove Hard to Get

By Donald Jennings (United Press Staff Correspondent) Pittsburgh (UP)—Because of mechanization, the coal industry is becoming a young man's game. The industry is spending considerable time and money trying to get the young men interested.

But you won't find high school boys overflowing with enthusiasm about coal mining as an occupation, especially those whose fathers did nothing else for years. "I'm definitely not interested," said Ted Guza, 17, a high school senior at Liberty, Pa., and the son of a coal miner. "I want to go to college and amount to something."

One of Ted's classmates, John McClymont, 18, is not decided on what to do after high school but "coal mining would be the last resort." His father is a coal miner, too.

Industry Confident Despite apparent general apathy on the part of the youngsters toward coal mining, the industry is confident of recruiting all the young replacements it will need in the future.

Employment service officials said that at present they have little difficulty finding men to fill openings. Better wages, mechanization of mining processes and improved working and safety conditions are depended upon to keep the coal companies supplied with labor personnel, they report.

Mechanization, combined with the closing of worked-out mines, is rapidly cutting down the number of employees because one machine can do the work of several men. Bituminous coal employed 600,000 men 20 years ago; today, 400,000.

The industry's problem now, however, is to get the youngsters into the fold because it finds the older miners (the average age of a miner is about 40) lack physical strength and technical know-how to handle the intricate machines of modern-day mining.

New Type Sought "It is evident that a new class of miner will be required to meet the new conditions," said M. D. Cooper, director of mining engineering education of the National Coal association, the "chamber of commerce" of the bituminous industry.

"He will be a highly skilled mechanic, able to operate or maintain equipment that is both heavy and fast moving. To be successful, he will need thorough training in the mechanics of machinery and the application of electricity."

That is the prospect the industry is setting before high school and college youths.

"The National Coal association," said John D. Battle, its executive vice-president, "is active toward alleviating the shortage of properly trained technical personnel available for employment in the industry."

Cooper devotes all his time to the production of mine training courses in colleges and high schools throughout the soft coal belt. The anthracite industry has also made a start in that direction.

Class members usually are sons of coal miners because "they are familiar with the working and living conditions of coal mining."

Results of the program so far convince the coal operators that they still have a lot of "selling" to do as far as the youngsters are concerned.

The Hudson Coal Co., of Seranton, Pa., said that of 18 youths graduated from its high school mining course at Blakely, Pa., not one went into coal mining.
