Fingerprints May Assist In Diagnosis of Disease

London (UP)—Scotland Yard's chief fingerprint expert has evolved the theory that doctors may be able to obtain warnings of impending illness by examining the fingerprints of their patients.

F. R. Cherrill said in an article in Nature, the scientific magazine, that his studies showed certain "white lines" often appeared on the left-hand prints of persons suffering from "pathological conditions."

Cherrill said he was led to his research by noticing that the left hand of dead people deteriorated more quickly than the right.

"It was then thought," he said, "that the left hand of a living person might show certain signs indicative of disease or even the approach of disease. A study of finger prints... lends some support to this contention."

Develop After Death "It is suggested that there may be some as yet undefined pathological cause for the occurrence of the creases which give rise to the white lines."

Cherrill said his theory was bolstered by finding that the "white lines" may continue to develop after death and thus are presumably not due to any biological development, since the actual bodily processes have ceased.

He cited cases of persons suffering from epilepsy, infantile paralysis and leprosy, in which the white lines appeared.

"Further investigation will be needed before any definite conclusions can be arrived at," he said, "but it is suggested that a prolonged scientific analysis of finger prints would, in some cases, supply evidence of incipient disease and its progress."

BATTLE OF THE BALLOTS—Newsmap shows states where close contests are expected in the November senatorial elections. In the former, Republican Henry Dworshak is fighting for a four-year term and in the latter Democrat William Benton hopes to fill out the remaining two years of his term.
