Navy Task Forces Prowling Off U.S. Coasts, in Maneuvers

By Charles Corridy (United Press Aviation Writer)

New York, June 21 (UP)—A navy task force, built around baby flat-tops and heavily armed attack planes, prowls off each coast today in constant readiness for anti-submarine operations.

While other surface forces do their best to elude undersea craft, these two task forces are prepared to spend all their time looking for and destroying such raiders.

A day spent on the U.S.S. Palau in search of "enemy" submarines gives a fair idea of how the task force functions.

The Palau, as Rear Adm. John P. Whitney, commander of task force 81 and carrier division 16, points out, is not a "plush job" like the heavy carrier Midway. As the admiral put it, this is how the "other half" lives.

Carriers Small

With its hunter-killer teams of Grumman "TBF" Avengers on board, a combat air patrol overhead and a two-destroyer escort, the Palau steamed into the Atlantic for about two hours. It is one of four small carriers—its flight deck is only 500 feet long—in division 15.

Capt. J. C. Renard, the skipper, ordered his Avengers off in pairs to begin the search for submarines. One plane is the hunter or search aircraft, with an enormous radar installation fastened beneath its fuselage. It is likely to spot a submarine if only a small portion shows above the surface. The other plane is the attack or killer craft. It carries rockets, machine guns, depth charges and big searchlights.

Buoys Dropped

If any part of the submarine is visible, the killer plane can make an effective attack. If the sub dives and gets away, the attack plane drops sonobuoys which broadcast underwater noises to the plane.

Meanwhile one or two destroyers, ordered from the carrier's protective screen, rush into the area and, using sonar equipment to make contact with the submarine, drop their depth charges and contact explosives. At worst, the destroyers can keep the submarine submerged for long periods and can make repeated attacks.

On this particular day, Renard demonstrated an additional wrinkle when the submarine Grampus appeared in the distance, dived and moved along under the surface with only its snorkel in view. A blimp, refueled from the carrier, was directed to administer the coup de grace. This is a good system when weather and enemy airplane permit.

Blimp Used

Equipped with radar, sonobuoys and magnetic airborne detection devices, the blimp hovered lazily over the submerged Grampus. From there it could hurl its underwater projectiles and depth charges.

The day is soon coming, Whitney said, when helicopters will augment the anti-submarine team that was developed during world war II.

Ochoco Timber Sale Record Set

Prineville, June 21 — When the Ochoco Lumber Co. Monday afternoon was awarded 475,000 feet of ponderosa pine timber in the Powderhouse district of the Ochoco national forest on an oral bid of $51 per 1,000 feet, an all-time record high price was scored. It topped by $2.75, the $47.25 which was bid at an early May auction by the Pine Products corporation for around 40,000,000 feet. The runner-up in the Monday afternoon auction was the Grizzly Lumber Co. The high price is attributed largely to the fact that there will be no expense in the way of building access roads to the timber, located about 36 miles east of here.

At another auction of around 300,000 feet of ponderosa pine, in
