C. THALER
(Staff Correspondent)

—Finn Moe, Norwegian member of the United Nations political committee, said today that the danger of war has lessened during the past year.

East nor West have the slightest attempt to understand each other, however, he said.

He said that the world situation is tense and that the "language" used in the news has increased fear.

He said, good-humoredly, who led his committee, "I am sorry to say the danger of war has lessened during the past year."

Some Progress

"Unless we can have the discussions on the reasons for our respective fears brought down to the level of calm and objectivity, it will be impossible to clarify the differences."

"It is from this point of view that I consider as the greatest achievement of this session the unanimous decision to establish a disarmament commission, even if it is evident that the opinions on disarmament are miles apart."

"This has been the first unanimous decision for a long time in the United Nations. If all differences could be discussed in the same quiet way, we should have taken the first important step on the road towards the relief of tension in the world."

"Nevertheless, I think it correct to say that even if the tension between East and West has not been eased, this session has not shown any increase in the tension."

"It is interesting to note that the strong will to peace in all countries, especially in those which do not belong directly to one or the other camp, expressed itself forcefully in several votes at this session."
