

Talk series examines importance of place

Eastern Oregon residents are invited to talk about power, place, home and belonging during an Oct. 13 event that is part of Oregon Humanities' statewide This Place series of free community conversations about place.

"Place" is a complicated and powerful idea that informs our identities and the way we live our lives, whether we're talking about the communities we're a part of, the neighborhoods where we live or the lands that people before us called "home."

This Place is a series of 90-minute community discussions sponsored by Oregon Humanities happening across the state this fall. A local discussion will take place from 6-7:30 p.m. Thursday, Oct. 13 at United Methodist Church, 301 S. Lake St. in Joseph.

The discussions provide Oregonians with an opportunity to explore their relationship to the places they've come from and the places they're in now; to consider how communities have lost or gained land and power, and how this has affected people within these communities; to consider the history of neighborhoods, communities, and the state, and how those places have changed over time; and to explore options for meaningful engagement with their places and communities going forward.

Participants will come away from this conversation with a strengthened sense of community support and collective engagement around their exploration of place, as well as a resource list and information to help them continue the conversation.

This Place is part of a statewide initiative by Oregon Humanities to bring 25 conversations about place to communities across the state in September and October 2016.

The community conversations will culminate in a one-day gathering on Oct. 28 at the Chehalum Cultural Center in Newberg.

These conversations will be
