OUT OF THE PAST

Armistice day was celebrated in Enterprise as elsewhere in the nation. The morning was sharp and bright, with new snow on the ground, but fire crackers were popping on every hand. From appearances, it might have been Christmas, but the spirit of the crowd was of the Fourth.

Elk still roam Billy Meadows, as W.S. Burleigh, deputy game warden, has not been advised how many are to be caught and removed to reserves and parks. Nothing final has been heard from Wallowa, which has planned to fence off the outlet to a mountain canyon and thus create a game reserve which was to be stocked with elk.

Ella T. Clayton, country treasurer, applied to the Court for a telephone in the treasurer's office and the application was allowed.

The second annual dinner of the Christian church was held last Friday at Fraternal hall. About 140 members and friends of the church assembled and were served with a splendid chicken dinner. A ladies aid society was organized at this meeting with Mrs. John Calvin, president; Mrs. Arthur Scott, vice president; Mrs. Vint Hart, secretary and treasurer. They will meet every Thursday afternoon.

During the course of the annual get-together at the Enterprise school by the teachers and school board members, the local police department was summoned to the party to place citations on a number of their cars which had been parked in the fire lane zone. As police went from car to car placing tickets on the windshields, they were accompanied by a number of high school students who were elated when the bus of a visiting volleyball team was cited.

A 1964 Chevrolet was taken from the Milligan Motors used car lot and later found wrecked alongside the highway between Enterprise and Joseph.

Researchers claim Neanderthals made eagle talon jewelry

Antonio Rodríguez-Hidalgo
Institute of Evolution in Africa (IDEA)

Eagle talons are regarded as the first materials used to make jewellery by Neanderthals, a practice which spread around Southern Europe about 120,000 and 40,000 years ago. Now, for the first time, researchers found evidence of the ornamental uses of eagle talons in Spain. The site is the cave Foradada in Calafell.

Dated as about 40,000 years old, this eagle talon necklace the most modern piece of the kind so far regarding the Neanderthal period and the first one found in the Iberian Peninsula. This circumstance wid-ens the temporary and geographical limits that were estimated for this kind of Neanderthal ornaments. This would be "the last necklace made by the Neanderthals," according to Professor Antonio Rodríguez-Hidalgo.

"Neanderthals used eagle talons as symbolic elements, probably as necklace pendants, from the beginnings of the mid Palaeolithic about 100,000 years ago," notes Antonio Rodríguez-Hidalgo. Researchers found bone remains from Spanish Imperial Eagle (Aquila Adalberti), from more than 39,000 years ago, with some marks that show these were used to take the talons so as to make pendants. The found remains correspond to the left leg of a big eagle. By the looks of the marks, and analogy regarding remains from different prehistorical sites and ethnographic documentation, researchers determined that the animal was not manipulated for consumption but for symbolic reasons. Eagle talons are the oldest ornamental elements known in Europe, even older than seashells

Homo sapiens sapiens perforated in northern Africa.

The findings belong to the châtelperronian culture, typical from the last Neanderthals that lived in Europe, and coincided with the moment when this species got in touch with Homo sapiens sapiens, from Africa -and expanding from the Middle East. Actually, this use of eagle talons as ornaments could have been a cultural transmission from the Neanderthals to modern humans, who adopted this practice after reaching Europe.
