Three-way race for Oregon governor generating tsunami of campaign cash

By GARY A. WARNER
Oregon Capital Bureau

A $100,000 check from a longtime conservative Oregon political donor to Republican Christine Drazan.

One for $100,000 to Betsy Johnson's insurgent campaign from a construction industry group.

Two liberal political action campaigns top off at the same level in their total giving to Democrat Tina Kotek.

The top candidates for governor continue to pile up stacks of cash in the race to the top of Oregon's political pyramid.

The trio has raised over $17.1 million since January 2021, on pace to blow past the 2018 record of $40 million when Democratic Gov. Kate Brown beat former Republican Rep. Knute Buehler of Bend.

The primaries are two months past and the general election more than three months away. The latest reports filed with the Oregon Secretary of State show a fluid financial situation.

Kotek and Drazan are coming off a May primary that saw the pair emerge from a combined roster of 34 candidates lured by the first open governor's race since 2010.

Dollar figures can be deceiving. Kotek reports $500,000 in the bank — 10% of what Johnson has tucked away.

Drazan has over

$300,000 from the Republican Governors Association. Kotek has $53,000 from the Democratic governors.

Kotek's spokesperson Katie Wertheimer says it's a wrinkle of post-primary financial report timing, not a measure of long-term strength. Little of the recent money shows the reaction to the Supreme Court ruling in late June gutting Roe v. Wade abortion rights in place since 1973.

"We've also seen a huge uptick in interest in volunteering to help Tina win in November," Wertheimer said. "We're confident that we will have the resources to win."

Drazan won the Republican primary with 23% of the vote and now has to rally the splintered factions behind her campaign as GOP standard-bearer. The six-figure national GOP commitment along with sizeable donations is $1 million more than Kotek and Drazan combined.

It's a formidable amount. But the former Democratic state senator from Columbia County still has to get on the November ballot and build a statewide campaign apparatus from scratch.

"We are in the home stretch of signature gathering and will far surpass the approximately 25,000 valid signatures we need to secure by Aug. 16 to put Betsy's name on the November ballot," said Jennifer Sitton, Johnson's spokesperson.

While her current money totals may dwarf her competitors, its a head start to build a bulwark against the likely flood of national party money that will flow into the race after Labor Day.

"We are proud of our fundraising, but know the party institutions are preparing to back up the Brinks trucks to spend it all attacking Betsy," Sitton said.

The 2022 race is already unique in Oregon political history and will mark major shifts no matter the outcome.
