

Overalls Club Idea Fails In Result, Claim

Characterizing the "overalls club" movement as a sweeping the country as a means of bringing down the high prices of clothes as a mistaken endeavor, speakers at the regular meeting Tuesday evening pointed out that the ultimate result of the campaign would be to strengthen, rather than weaken the clothing market, and that the movement would react against those whom it is intended to benefit in the long run.

"The abnormal demand which the overalls club idea is creating for denim cannot but force prices of that material out of sight," said one member of the league. "The resulting increase in the price of overalls will strike directly at the working man, who must wear overalls as his every-day garb. Nor does the demand stop at the rate in overall prices; the accompanying drain on the cotton market will result in a higher level, put cotton at such a price that consumers will fall back upon wool for a relief. This latter movement will add strength to the wool market and clothing prices will go still higher under the combined influence of advances both in cotton and wool.

"The actuating motive of those behind the overalls club movement to bring down the high prices of clothing is commendable, and it will be found that the retail merchants are in hearty accord with any campaign which will actually accomplish this end. But this movement will serve only to accentuate the present firmness of the clothing market, which have been showing signs of breaking.

"The plan to wear old clothes and refrain from buying new until prices break is sensible and should have the desired effect."

Figures indicating that clothing prices today are relatively lower than before the war, when compared with present day wage scales and prices on commodities, were also presented.

What's a "fair price?"

WHEN you buy anything, you ought to be willing to pay at least what it cost to produce it; plus a margin of profit to the maker, and to the merchant who has brought the merchandise to you; where you can see it, examine it, try it on, decide that it's what you want.

The Service rendered by the maker and the merchant are a part of what you pay for; you ought to pay for it willingly. If that service were not rendered there wouldn't be any merchandise here for you to buy.

Now, we aim to charge for our clothes merely "fair" prices; fair to both of us. We're going to make a fair profit, too. Our profit comes out of the money you pay us; yours comes out of the clothes you get.

Hart Schaffner & Marx clothes give you the greatest profit; they cost enough to be good clothes; all-wool fabrics, perfectly tailored smartly styled. They're the best clothes for you; that's why we sell them.
