

Board Abolishes Manual Training In Three Schools

Salem Directors Unanimous In Refusal To Raise Teachers' Wages; Richmond Patrons Ask Junior High; 26 Instructors Resign; Wood for Next Year to Cost $5,500

Election of Salem teachers for the coming year; abolition of the manual training department in all three junior high schools; refusal to raise the wage scale of instructors, except as it automatically increases, and consideration of a proposal to create a junior high school in the Richmond district—these items claimed the attention of the school board at its specially called meeting last night.

Chief discussion of the evening centered around the wage problem. Holding that it would be difficult to raise any salaries without raising all of them, W. C. Winslow expressed himself as opposed to paying any more money to certain principals. This view was accepted by Dr. H. H. Olinger, who eventually put the motion that no salaries be increased for the coming year. The motion was unanimously adopted.

Vote Is Split.

The abolition of manual training departments in the junior high schools came only after the board had split half and half on the proposal. George Halvorsen and Walter Winslow voted against the proposal and Paul Wallace and Dr. Olinger voted for it. The deciding vote which put the department in the discard came from Harley White, chairman of the board. Mr. Winslow's contention that the manual training department was instrumental in keeping many boys in school was met with the argument that boys of junior high school age must necessarily be in school.

Superintendent Hug was ordered by the board to thorough investigate conditions having to do with a request made by patrons of the Richmond district who made a second formal request last night that the board establish a junior high school in the Richmond school building. John Giesy, heading a committee, called on the board, made a convincing talk to the board in which he declared that the children of the Richmond district are forced to walk much too far to junior high school. A petition signed by 140 residents of the district was presented to the board. At the next meeting the board will consider Mr. Hug's report on the matter.

Wood Costs $5,500.

Wood for the schools during the coming year will cost approximately $5,500, according to a statement made last night by Mr. Winslow. The cost will be about the same next year as it was for this, it was said.

The resignation of 26 teachers were accepted by the board. Following is a list of teachers elected:
