The Indian Revolt

Lord Northcliffe, who has completed a tour of the world, reports systematic propaganda extending from the Fiji islands in the mid-Pacific to the west coast of Africa against white dominion and predicts epochal changes pending from the awakening of nationalism and racial consciousness following the world war and as a result of the extension of knowledge through the printing press. The dark-hued peoples are adopting the ideas and methods of their fairer skinned over-lords.

Islam is seething with unrest and there is turmoil and trouble throughout the Mahammedan world, in the isles of the Pacific, in Central Asia, in Persia, in Arabia, in Palestine, in the Balkans, in French Syria, in Greek Smyrna, in British Egypt, in Italian Libya, in French Algiers and in Spanish Morocco. There are over 300,000,000 Moslems uniting with a common purpose—the end of white rule.

Egyptians have already wrested from Britain a larger share of home government than enjoyed for many centuries, and India is now seething with revolt. There is a question whether Britain can much longer rule India, despite liberal concessions for home rule. It is significant that Northcliffe talks in the following vein:

"Whether the retention of our possessions in India is an advantage to Great Britain is a question much debated. Whether the British (Scotch mostly) who go there in considerable numbers would not be more happily engaged in opening up the vast wealth of Australia is a subject which is more and more engaging the attention of those who have seen the whole of the British Empire and not merely a part. Up to this time the welfare of India, the warding off of famine throughout the country, the furtherance of education, have been part and parcel of the creed of the average Englishman at home. India is not, and cannot be, ruled by the sword. The small handful of white men there could be wiped out in a moment if India were united, which it very obviously is not.

India has population of hundreds of millions, a vast conglomeration of diverse races, tribes, and religions. Of these only 180,000 are Europeans. Previous to the advent of the British, the country was divided into many warring kingdoms and frequently the prey of invaders from the north who despoiled the land. Few of the inhabitants are of military disposition, most of these latter are Mohammedans, and it is because of their discontent over the treatment accorded Turkey, whose Sultan is head of the church, that British residents of India have appealed to London for revision of the treaty of Sevres. The request indicates the seriousness of the Indian situation.

The Indian revolt is led by the Mahatma Ghandi, a high cast Hindu, educated in England, who has preached the doctrine of non-cooperation while uniting the discordant elements in the common cause for white expulsion, though there is nothing to indicate but that if the British withdrew, anarchy would not again rule India, as it did before their entry. The Indians have never demonstrated capacity for self-government since the first white rulers were absorbed by the aborigines, despite the caste system they instituted to preserve racial purity.

The inspiration of imperialism is the rule and exploitation of distant peoples for profit—not the profit of the people of the ruling nation, but of special classes, who fasten the "white-man's burden" upon the rank and file. The people of America never profited by our seizure of the Philippines. They have been an expensive burden to the people. But certain interested persons and parties have profited immensely and are still profiting. India probably does not profit the average British tax-payer, but it does certain British interests, for the East India Company has been the source of much wealth to those interested, and the foundation of many fortunes.

India is not exploited today as in the days of Hastings, when wholesale robbery was the rule, but is useful as a source of raw materials and as a market for British manufacturers and quite important to British commerce. British rule has been a blessing to India. Under it the country has prospered, industry expanded, production increased, famines eliminated and law and order replaced anarchy. This was fine as long as the east thought as the east, but now it is thinking on western lines and wants self-determination.

There is no question but that eastern and western civilizations are entering upon a period of readjustment, such as has not been experienced since the Turk first invaded Europe and Islam, with its hundreds of millions united in fanaticism, has an advantage over a discordant and prostrate Christendom, exhausted by civil wars. There are indications that western imperialism is doomed and that sooner or later the white race must surrender its overlordship and permit the colored races to rule themselves or face a world wide revolution in exploited lands.

Cotton Mill Cuts Wages 20 Percent

Lawrence Mass., March 21.—The Pacific Mills, a cotton and worsted plant employing 10,000 persons normally, today announced a wage reduction of approximately 20 per cent. Two other large plants here were understood to be preparing a similar announcement for issuance later in the day. The Pacific cut, effective March 27 is the first in this big textile center since the movement of wage revisions began this year. It is one of the few made in Massachusetts mills to date.

John Storm's Strange Behavior
When I awakened this morning Kitty had already left the apartment. I started up with a start, realizing it must be late. I was feeling the way a diver would feel upon a first attempt of Theodora's independence. I was to enjoy a day or two of vacation.

I rolled back in bed propped up by a couple of pillows.

My mind reverted to my problems. Should I marry Theo—a celebrity—and enjoy the life of ease and position he could offer me; or should I choose Eddie Montforth, and thus become the wife of a man destined to become a prosperous country squire? As I weighed these questions I was struck with the thought: "What has become of my ambitions for a career?"

I dismissed that thought abruptly—and turned again to Theo and Eddie.

I knew that by all the dictates of common sense I should care more for Eddie Montforth than for Theodore Stratton. Eddie was of my own age and my own people. Eddie's outlook upon life would harmonize with mine. We would understand each other.

And what had Theodore Stratton to offer?

I read and re-read Theo's impassioned letter. From it I got nothing—nothing but a selfish expression of his want of me.

Theo wanted my youth to put new life into his existence.

Theo wanted my flesh, unsophisticated view of life as a new starting point from which he could survey life anew. His letter was full of the hopes, desires and fears of Theodore Stratton.

Several times I thought I had better answer Theo's letter. But each time Kitty's wise counsel prevailed and I did not write.

I put nothing upon paper. This decided upon I arose, dressed and breakfasted. After that I tried to read. Tiring of that I began fussing about my clothes. A girl in moving pictures spends most of her spare time freshening her wardrobe. Clothes are a large part of her stock-in-trade.

During the morning John Storm called on me. "I wish you would go with me out to the studio where Kitty is making her picture," he said.

It was interesting to note that although Kitty was not playing the important part John Storm never spoke of it except as "her picture."

I looked at him compassionately. John and Kitty's affair always seemed so much bigger than my own because I could see no loophole whereby these two people—who I loved so dearly and who were so deserving of content—could slip through the corridors of society and find at least a little of their share of human happiness.

"Do you have to go out this morning, John?" I felt a little sinking of my heart as I tried to divert him, because I knew that Kitty would like to keep John Storm and Julian Thorndyke apart.

Carters Refuse To Work; Belfast Snipers Feared

Belfast, Mar. 21.—(By Associated Press)—James Magee was shot by gunmen in Harding street last night. Military forces sent to the scene met a fusillade of revolver shots, under cover of which the assassins escaped. Magee died today.

Many carters failed to report for work today, in protest against the lack of protection from snipers.

As the day advanced, the carters' strike became practically complete, only tram cars and bread vans being operated.
