Slayer of Burgess

At that time, Davidson declared, he threw his gun on Ogle with the gun cocked and his finger on the trigger and ordered him back. "Ogle coolly glanced along the barrel and laughed but he got back and never crossed the dead line again," he explained.

"He was the coolest man I ever saw in all my 16 years of prison work, and one of the most desperate men, too, in my opinion." Should Ogle have succeeded in hitting Davidson, and knocking him from the wall, prison officials explained this morning, it would not have been a difficult matter to have mounted to the roof of the cell house from which access to the wall surrounding the prison would have been no difficult feat for a desperate man.

Confessed Murder. Ogle was received at the prison on November 28, 1919, together with David Smith and Walter Banaster, the three having been sentenced to life terms for the murder of Perringer and Burgess, Umatilla county ranchers, in the Claremont tavern near Portland.

Several months after their arrival at the prison Ogle made a confession in which he took the entire responsibility for the shooting in the tavern.

In connection with this morning's incident prison officials recalled the threat of James Stanley, an ex-convict, who left the prison Sunday after serving a three year sentence for burglary.

Stanley, it is said, had threatened to devote his time on the "outside" toward the release of certain of his prison cronies. The robbery of the Watt Shipp powder house near the prison on the night of Stanley's release, and the disappearance of a number of sticks of dynamite lead prison officials to believe that there was some connection between this incident, the promise of Stanley and the incident leading to the killing of Ogle following his threat to leave the prison after "getting somebody" connected with that institution.
