A Volstead Violator

A letter read in the senate last week by Senator Watson of Georgia, written by George Washington and addressed to Captain John Thompson, sailing master, reads:

"With this letter comes a Negro, Tom, which I beg the favor of you to sell in any of the islands you may go to for whatever he will fetch, and bring me in return for him one hoghead of best molasses, one hoghead of best rum, one barrel of limes, if good and cheap, one pot of Tamarinda, two small pots of mixed sweet meats, and residue, much or little, in good old spirits."

A negro was worth a good many drinks in those days, and the Father of his Country was evidently a discriminating toper, for as he owned a distillery of his own, he knew the difference between newly made moonshine and "rare old spirits" and also the value of variety for punches—for the cock-tail had not been invented. In his biographies it is said that the first thing he did in the morning was to take a drink of rum, and at his dinner he had cider or beer, finishing up with two glasses of Mederia wine.

All of which shows what a horrible example George Washington set and how much more virtuous we are today. Men and morals change and nowadays it is against the law not only to sell negroes but to barter for booze. It is questionable whether the Father of his Country would recognize his native land and its institutions were he to return and he certainly would have a hard time under the Volstead act this Fourth of July celebrating independence.

Jazz and Flappers

Jazz and flappers have found a champion in the person of Andre Tridon, noted psychologist and psycho-analyst, who flays "fool reformers" as meddlers with nothing else to do, "declaring that jazz should be our national pastime, as it is 'the decent satisfying of our gorilla instincts.'" He says:

"Jazz should be encouraged. It is the modern saturnalia which allows us to satisfy our gorilla instincts in a ball room in a perfectly nice, decent, orderly and open manner. It is an excellent substitute for alcohol. There is not enough fun in our present world, but jazz allows for the breaking down of stiff, formal social barriers and provides for an atmosphere conducive to decent fun and sport.

"Jazz should be our national pastime. It provides an outlet for our excess energy."

Turning to the flapper, the noted psychologist characterized her as "the hope of the modern world, a revolt against government by old maids." He declared:

"God bless her for her picturesque costume and original ways. She adds color to the drabness of the city. The flapper of today will be a better mother than the mothers of the past, because she will grow up with her children, mingle with them, understand them and love them."

Whether we agree with the above or not, it is quite evident that both jazz and the flapper have come to stay and we might as well make the best of them.

HARDING VISITS FRIENDS TODAY

Marion, Ohio, July 5.—President Harding's second day in Marion as a home coming visitor gave promise today of being the most strenuous he has spent since leaving Washington last Saturday. Arrangements had been made for him to review a historical parade during the afternoon, but aside from this there was no scheduled public appearance.

It was expected that the president would spend most of the day with members of his family and visiting with some of his intimate friends.

This is the final day of Marion's centennial and the home coming celebration.

DANDYO IS BOUND OVER AT HEARING

Frank Dandoy, who was arrested here several days ago by Chief of Police Moffitt on a charge of contributing to the delinquency of minor children, was bound over to the grand jury by Judge G. E. Unruh following Dandoy's preliminary hearing in the justice court Monday afternoon. Dandoy is said to be an ex-convict. Several children testified concerning his activities.

Word received by Chief Moffitt from Great Falls, Montana, yesterday, indicates that Dandoy was once arrested in that city on a similar charge.

Fifty Years Ago

A woman in Lynn, Mass., was steeping herbs on her kitchen stove according to a recipe of her own, to furnish medicine for the women of the neighborhood. Today, a stone's throw from the little house where she lived, there is a four story laboratory, making the same medicine for the women of the world. During the last year almost 500 tons of carefully selected herbs were used in the manufacture of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. A woman's medicine for woman's ailments. Have you tried it?

Love's Masquerade

By Idah McGlone Gibson

Margaret's Plan

"I believe, John," said Claverling, "that Milt's feeling for Margaret Earle is greater than the usual emotion that men call love. His devotion is composed of pity, regard and respect, friendship and a very little passion."

"He pities her when he thinks of her splendid attainments and knows that she is throwing herself away on a man like Harry Glendening. He has a wholesome respect, however, for her courage in acknowledging that love, as well as in denying it when she found that he did not love her as she did him."

"His regard and friendship for her come from his admiration of her intellect and their community of tastes."

"I do hope that neither of them let any foolish memories of what has gone before prevent them from being happy in the future. It will be a tragedy if Margaret comes home with Glendening still in her heart."

"But you never can tell just what two people will do. In fact you never can tell just what one person will do under any circumstances."

"That's what makes life interesting, Jim," remarked Davis. "That is why we all hate to leave it—we're always looking to see what will happen next."

"A great mistake was made in describing the orthodox heaven as a place where everything was decided—where every doubt and fear was obliterated, and where everyone knew just what everything would be throughout all eternity."

"Yes, it is rather a stupendous thought, and rather trying too," answered Claverling rising. "I'm going to turn in, John. I feel as though I had not slept for a week."

"A good idea," smiled Davis. "What the morrow bringeth no man knoweth."

Davis sat for some time after Claverling left, trying to work out a solution to the drama that had been played up almost to the final curtain during the last few days. At last with a gesture that showed that he did know how it was all going to end, he rose and went toward the door to a knock. A messenger boy was waiting with a cablegram.

Heastily tearing it open, he read:

"Claverling's cable received. Am sailing tomorrow on Aquitania. If Dr. Milton does not improve, advise me by wireless."

"Margaret Earle."

As though the message answered one of his questions, Davis put the message into his pocket with a sigh of relief and went up to bed.

He had the morning papers brought to him early but there seemed to be nothing particularly new in them. Adams had been held for murder in the first degree and the date for the trial had been set for a month hence to allow time for the recovering of Glendening whose testimony was needed.

The notice of the funeral of Mrs. Milton was printed conspicuously, saying that the obsequies were private.

There was a notice to the effect that Harry Glendening had changed for the better, and that his wife who had withdrawn her petition for divorce, would probably visit him in the afternoon.

There was also a long account of the burial of Claire Adams and a description of the demeanor of her husband at the grave.

One reporter had made quite a pitiful story out of it. He was evidently a chap with much imagination, sympathy and understanding, and he drew his picture with sure and clever strokes. Davis found tears in his eyes when he reached the end and read: "I think in the lives of most women and men

That all would go smooth and even; if only the dead would just know when

In estimating the value of capital stock, the surplus and undivided profits must be included.
