Maybe the Price of Grapes Is Due to the Pressing Demand

West Salem

West Salem

High Tolle, Or., Oct. 15.—With the exception of the high Premiums paid by Mrs. E. J. Applewhite, one of the farmers in this vicinity, who has made a flying visit on her return from California, it is reported that the season for the sale of grapes is over.

The average price paid for the grapes has been from $2.50 to $3.00 per box, but some have been sold for as much as $3.50 per box.

There have been a number of growers who have failed to make a profit on their grapes, but many have done well.

The season for the sale of grapes has been very short, and the grapes have not been as good as in previous years.

Several growers have been disappointed in their expectations, but others have been satisfied with the results.

The demand for grapes has been very heavy, and the supply has been limited.

The high prices paid for the grapes have been due to the heavy demand and the limited supply.

There have been some complaints of the quality of the grapes, but on the whole, they have been considered good.

The season for the sale of grapes is now over, and the growers are looking forward to next year's crop.