Six lights, which will be kept burning day and night for the benefit of river transportation, were placed at various points of danger along the Willamette river between Salem and Lincoln today. J. M. Spang, Salem riverman, erected the lights and will have charge of keeping them burning. They are being put up at the order of the federal superintendent of light house, and will be kept going at federal expense. The light nearest Salem will be placed at Kizer Bend, a point some half dozen miles down the river from Salem. The principal transportation is carried on by the Northwesters, which makes three runs a week between Portland and Salem. A number of tug boats take raft of logs down the river, and will have use for the lights.

When newspapermen entered the offices of the public service commission this morning they waded up to their chins in some new fluff rugs—at least the rugs looked new. Hi Corey, chairman of the commission, explained, however, that a local weaver had manufactured the rugs from carpets that had lain on office floors in the top story of the state house since 1886, a period of 39 years. "I believe they are now good for another 30 years at least," Corey said. On the under side of the old carpets were the dates when they were laid in the state house.
