A complaint filed yesterday by the Iron Hill Orchard company against R. A. West was dismissed in Judge McMahon's court this morning as being a case over which the equity court had no jurisdiction. The company alleged that West, while drilling a well, had lost his drill at a depth of about 194 feet, that he was insolvent and threatened to move away and sought an injunction to restrain him from moving his equipment until the well was finished. The court held it was a matter for damages and a law court to decide, and not one for injunction proceedings.

J. W. Howard, superintendent of the Oregon state school for the blind, appeared before the Salem Lions club at its luncheon at the Marion hotel today, making a brief speech concerning the blind school. There are 47 blind students enrolled at the school this year, he stated, two less than the number a year ago, when the school had the largest enrollment in its history. "There is a strong tendency among people without sight," he said, "to take up the study of music. Some become exceptionally good at it, probably due to the fact that their sense of sound becomes highly developed when they lose their sense of sight." One student of the school, Elizabeth Huggins, read two pieces out of her embossed book, prepared especially for the use of blind readers.

The 1924-25 school term officially came to a close for Salem public schools today. Report cards, carrying final grades, were given out to all students in the school system. Wednesday was the last day of actual school work. High school seniors have not been required to attend classes all week.
